ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

To the many who have contributed to this exploration I offer hearty thanks. I greatly appreciate the helpful comments and suggestions of David Bennett, Charles Hockett, David Lockwood, William Sullivan, and others on early drafts of this work; William Sullivan has also gone through this latest version finding infelicities. These colleagues are in no way to be blamed for any of the faults that still remain.

Many thanks to Stella DeMayo for the idea of using ‘pathways’ in the title, to Lilly Lee Chen for the calligraphy in Chapter Thirteen, and to Konrad Koerner and Anke de Looper for their editorial skill and general most cooperative helpfulness.

I feel as well great gratitude to many teachers, both direct — those whom I studied with — and indirect. Among the former are especially Murray Emeneau, Mary Haas, and Francis Whitfield; the latter include Louis Hjelmslev, Charles Hockett, and Michael Halliday, as well as many colleagues and several academic generations of my students who kept asking stimulating questions. My graduate students get some special thanks; the ones most recent, Colin Harrison, John Newell, Ada Rohde, Xiuhong Zhang, have made me turn my thoughts to questions that I hadn’t yet been asking and have helped me get to know important literature.

Not all important teachings come from words nor charts and diagrams, and I have learned from many sources that can’t care about my gratitude, like trees and mountain streams and ocean waves and traffic on the road and music and the laughter of a child.

The figures have been drawn with artistry and skill (and help from his computer) by my student Colin Harrison, who has prepared as well the camera-ready text and index, and he also has reviewed the text for infelicities that slipped right past my spell-check and my weary eyes, as well as repetitions and the like. His knowledge, expertise, and cheerful help I heartily and gratefully applaud.

No words suffice to give expression to the gratitude I have for all the help and patience and encouragement I have received, with loving smiles, from Susan Lamb.
