ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

I am indebted to many people for making this volume possible. First of all, to the authors of the articles here included, for having presented and discussed their theses at the conference "Linguistics Theory in Speech and Language Pathology and in Speech Therapy", held in Padova in August 2000. Their help and co-operation with the editorial work has been invaluable. My intellectual debt goes to my colleagues of the Department of Linguistics of the University of Padova, Alberto Mioni and Alberto Zamboni. They helped me constantly with my project to involve the Department of Linguistics in the offering of Clinical Linguistics courses at the Faculty of Medicine. Without their unstinting support, this project would never have materialised.

This Padova conference was organised with the support of a grant from Cofinanziamento Murst (1998-9810197024), whose national co-ordinator was Professor Alberto Mioni. It was important for this project to succeed that I was at the time a member of the Psychology Faculty of the University of Padova. This volume is giving me the opportunity to thank my colleagues of the Faculty of Psychology of the University of Padova, Remo Job, Alberto Mazzocco and Sergio Roncato, for having first supported the role of linguistics within the psychological sciences, for having fostered the academic co-operation between researchers from various disciplines, and for having included, already ten years ago, the teaching of General Linguistics within the Psychology curricula. Likewise, I would also like to express my gratitude to my colleagues in the Faculty of Medicine of Padova, Corrado Angelini, Anna Maria Laverda, and Carla Monciotti. To all of them, I extend my gratitude for believing that linguistics can play an important role in cognitive and neurolinguistic research, and for their active interest in humanistic disciplines.

The delegate of the Rector of the University of Padova, Filippo Donà dalle Rose, responsible for the Socrates exchange program of the Padova Athenaeum, has made incredibly tenacious and generous efforts to involve students and professors in the organisation of the Erasmus-Socrates Projects. The didactic experience with Socrates students and colleagues was an important moment of this project. I owe fruitful discussions on the topics of this volume to Paola Crisma of the University of Trieste, Denis Delfitto of the University of Utrecht, Giuseppe Longobardi of the University of Trieste, Anna Thornton of the University of L'Aquila, and Nicola Grandi of the University of Milano Bicocca. I also would like to thank my new colleagues of the Humanities Faculty of Ferrara, Claudio Iacobini, Marina Nespor, and Carlotta Sanfilippo. I hope to be able to collaborate with them on future projects.

Tullio De Mauro of the University of Rome was generous with information on and discussion of the structuralist tradition. I would also like to express my gratitude to my colleagues of the Master's degree program in Logopedics in Padova, especially Paola Crisma, Mario D'Angelo, Sara Gesuato, Carlo Schirru, Flavia Ursini, and Alessandro Zijno. Their contribution in defending the project of a Clinical Linguistics degree at the Faculty of Medicine in Padova has been invaluable. As well, I owe an expression of thanks to Sara Gesuato for her editing of the first draft of the volume; I also remain grateful to her for the emotional support she offered me during this period. To Nadia Radovich and to Alberto Mello, of the printing desk of Palazzo Maldura of the University of Padova, goes my expression of thanks for helping in the formatting of the volume, for their technical support, for sharing their experience with me, and for their kind co-operation generally.

Last but not least, I am grateful to E.F.K. Koerner, the editor of "Current Issues in Linguistic Theory", who first proposed the publication of this volume, for keeping an active interest in the process and progress in the preparation of the final copy. His work as editor and his role as moderator in the linguistic sciences cannot be overestimated. He provided invaluable criticism, comments and directions in editing this volume. It has been a great privilege for me to benefit from his unequalled experience. I also would like to express my gratitude to Anke de Looper of John Benjamins Publishing Company for her patience and kindness.
