Acknowledgments

This book would not have been possible without the help of many people to whom I am greatly indebted. I am grateful for the support of my colleagues at the University of Frankfurt, particularly to my supervisor Marlis Hellinger, to Bettina Migge, Raimund Schiess and to the members of the long-standing Postcolonial Theory colloquium. Many thanks go to those who provided assistance and shelter during my fieldwork research in London, especially Glenda Trew, Claudia McKenzie and Klaus Peter Steiger, as well as to numerous people who acted as informants, took us into their homes and were willing to share conversations and give interviews. During the course of this work I have benefitted from many conversations with Caribbean writers and I would like to thank especially John Agard, the late Amryl Johnson, Janice Shinebourne and Jean 'Binta' Breeze for their enlightening comments. My understanding of the linguistic and social processes that I try to describe in this book is particularly indebted to discussions with Mark Sebba, Lise Winer, Carolyn Cooper, Christian Mair, Lawrence Carrington and Carol Pfaff. Many thanks also go to those who commented on earlier drafts of this work, especially to Michel DeGraff, Jacques Arends, Rainer Schulze, Mark Stein and Katja Sarkowsky. I appreciate their comments and advice, any shortcomings are, of course, due to me entirely. More than words can ever express I am indebted to the inspiration, companionship and support of Tobias Döring without whom nothing would have been possible.
