Acknowledgments

This study is a revised and extended version of my Ph.D. dissertation, completed in January 1991 at the Department of Linguistics of Harvard University. My first thanks go to the three members of my thesis committee, for whose guidance I am sincerely grateful: Susumu Kuno and Catherine Snow of Harvard University, and Suzanne Flynn of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. I am also indebted to Lydia White of McGill University for her comments on the manuscript.

I would like to express my appreciation to the students of several institutions who participated in the experiments described in this study, including the Cambridge Center for Adult Education, Boston College, Boston University, Dokkyo University, Harvard University, Harvard University Extension, Harvard University Spouses' Program, International Christian University, Showa Women's Institute, and YMCA Boston.

For help in developing the experimental materials, I thank Robert Chibka, Kohji Hoshi, Akio Kamio, Masatoshi Koizumi, Yuiko Ogura, Kazutaka Ohta, Seiji Naito, Daniel Radzinski, and Kenneth Wexler.

For help locating subjects, I would like to thank Faith Barcus, Joan Bartel, Bill Biddle, Ray Biggar, Steven Christenson, Becky Copeland, Jackie Dailey, Andrew Garrett, Kurumi Hiki, Madelyn Kissock, Miriam Kurland, Dorothy Linde, Ryooko Murano, Yuki Sakamaki, James Smith, James Sullivan, and Keno Valenzuela.

For statistical assistance, I am indebted to Cliff Mulligan and Larry Zuborski; for bibliographical help, Susan Bennett, Patricia Balcom, Gerald Berent, Makiko Hirakawa, Dami Lee, Joyce Neu, and Yukio Otsu; for their comments on Chapter 6, Susan Bennett and Dawn MacLaughlin; and for help in numerous practical matters during my stay in Japan, Akio Kamio.

I am grateful for the financial support of the Office for Educational Research and Improvement through a Center for Language Education and Research sub-contract to Harvard Graduate School of Education (Catherine Snow, project Principal Investigator). The generous support of a Dokkyo University International Cooperation Research Fellowship made collection of the Japanese data possible.

Finally, I thank the editors of Studies in Second Language Acquisition and of Language for their permission to use data which first appeared in those journals.
