Ludwig Wittgenstein says:

Die Philosophie ist ein Kampf gegen die Verhexung unseres Verstandes durch die Mittel unserer Sprache.

Translated in the Oxford Dictionary of Quotations as:

Philosophy is a battle against the bewitchment of our intelligence by means of language.

In the battle against the linguistic bewitchment that I at times experienced when writing this book, I was supported by the following people. I want to thank:

Erich Steiner and Neal Norrick, who were the supervisors of my PhD thesis and always gave valuable advice. Jürgen Esser with whom I started my PhD studies in Bonn. Collins Publishers for permission to use the Bank of English, and Jeremy Clear for technical support. Wolfgang Teubert and the team at the University of Birmingham, where I spent several months doing research. The DAAD and the Cusanuswerk who supported me with scholarships, but even more important than the financial support was the ‘social context’ offered by the Cusanuswerk and the friends I found there.

Special thanks go to Silvia Hansen-Schirra, Michael Hoey, Ramesh Krishnamurthy, Gaby Mahlberg, Joybrato Mukherjee, Heiko Schilling, John Sinclair, Mike Stubbs, and an anonymous reviewer for reading and commenting on earlier versions or parts of this book. All remaining errors are entirely my own.

... and thanks also go to my family and friends who made sure that, in spite of any kind of battle, life was still enjoyable.
