This book has been made possible by the heart-warming support of many colleagues, friends, and my family. I am particularly indebted to Elizabeth Couper-Kuhlen, whose passion, meticulousness, and fascination with prosody and its role in talk-in-interaction got me started thinking about and working on prosodic phenomena. Thank you for numerous inspiring data sessions, your wholehearted encouragement throughout this undertaking, as well as observant and valuable comments on specific research issues and manuscript chapters. I also owe the greatest of debts to Sandy Thompson; when talking to each other about my struggle with prosodic units on a park bench at UCSB in September 2006, she not only planted the idea in my head that we may have to pursue this issue in a different way but, together with her husband Mack, she also encouraged me to pursue my project with truly interested questions whenever we met again anywhere around the world. I am also grateful to Elizabeth Couper-Kuhlen and Sandy Thompson for their comments on two earlier versions of the manuscript; I am truly honored that you accepted the product of all this thinking into your book series.

Heartfelt thanks go to Stefan Pfänder, who enabled me to take time off from teaching and administration in order to accomplish this project, along with my family duties, in the institutional environment of the Hermann Paul School of Linguistics at Freiburg and who willingly provided me with considerate and supportive comments on many of the issues discussed in this book. Special thanks is also due to Christian Mair, who – on top of all his own students and duties – readily accepted me as a post-doc degree candidate, patiently waited to see the step-by-step results of my undertaking, provided me with helpful and motivating comments, believed that it would be finished some day, and, together with Stefan Pfänder, steered me through the process of obtaining a post-doc degree from Freiburg university.

I would also like to thank Jack du Bois, John Local, Richard Ogden, and Gareth Walker for data sessions, technical advice, and – most of all – for their supportive comments. For their insightful discussion of single chapters and specific issues, I am grateful to Peter Auer, Arnulf Deppermann, Oliver Ehmer, Elisabeth Reber, Margret Selting, and “my team” at Potsdam University, in particular Uwe Küttner and Bernhard Bielick.

Thanks are also due to Allison Adelman for her meticulous reading and insightful comments on my non-native English manuscript draft as well as for the professional support of Isja Conen and Patricia Leplae and their team from Benjamins throughout the publishing process. A major “thank you” also goes to my student assistants: first of all, to Krischan Range and Fabian Schubö, who started exploring the prosodic-phonetic structuring of talk with me and who found many fuzzy intonation-unit boundaries back in 2007, as well as to Marit Aldrup, Sarah Bertz, and Cindy Reinhardt, who helped to edit the examples and the reference section.

Finally, none of this would have been possible without my family. I would like to express my heartfelt thanks to my husband Peter, not only for his occasional technical help, but also – and above all – for his continuous mental and emotional support as well as his unwavering love throughout these years (and many more to come); and to Anne and Jakob for their patience with their working mum. You know what it means to me.
