

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

A book such as this is the product of a certain amount of personal endeavour and a great deal of learning from the insights and labours of friends and colleagues. Many of these have been fellow travellers in a process which included two workshops at Columbia University, New York (in 2013 and 2016), presentations at Harvard University's Davis Center, Vilnius University and the University of Glasgow (2015), a panel at the meeting of the International Studies Association in San Francisco (2013), and a book conference at the University of Exeter (2015). They include Zulfia Abdullaeva, Fiona Adamson, John Agnew, Olivia Allison, Nils-Christian Bormann, Asel Doolotkeldieva, Saipira Fürstenburg, John Helmer, Alisher Ilkhamov, Edward Lemon, David Lewis, Tom Mayne, Ronen Palan, Jason Sharman, Kemel Toktomushev, David Trilling, Bill Vlcek, and Monica Whitlock. Many of these people read chapters in detail. We also thank four anonymous reviewers appointed by Yale. Authors of articles in the special issue of Central Asian Survey in 2015 on 'Offshore Central Asia' made their own important contributions to getting tax havens and extraterritoriality on the agenda of the study of the region. Stacy Closson, Charles Dainoff, Erica Marat, Jennifer Murtazashvili and Adrien Fauve as well as Doolotkeldieva, Sharman and Toktomushev helped inform our own work. We also thank Deniz Kandiyoti and, subsequently, Madeleine Reeves for their support.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Research collaboration and assistance has had a direct effect on this book. We must especially recognise Sharman and Doolotkeldieva again for their co-authorships with Cooley<sup>1</sup> and Heathershaw<sup>2</sup> respectively of material that in revised form has made its way into the succeeding chapters. Heathershaw's earlier work with Nick Megoran partially inspired this book's attempt to change the conversation about security in Central Asia.<sup>3</sup> Mayne's early reporting for Global Witness (GW) on Central Asia's offshore connections was path-breaking and his advice on sources invaluable. A team of student researchers from the University of Exeter then worked with Mayne and Chido Dunn to trawl through Land Registry records in earlier research published by GW.<sup>4</sup> Journalists and officials in Kyrgyzstan who shall remain unnamed helped in the background research, and the equally courageous Sean Daley shared his experiences of his attempted assassination during the time of the Bakiyev administration. We learnt from the investigative instincts of journalists John Helmer, David Trilling, Bernt Gran and the legal expertise of Scott Horton. Eve Bishop, Rosa Brown and Juliana Angeles Ruiz at Exeter worked with speed and efficiency on the production and review of the Central Asian Political Exiles Database. Over a dozen human rights activists reviewed the database and provided invaluable comments. Sarah Calderone, Casey Michel and Max de Havalang of Columbia University provided excellent research assistance. The talented Seth Farkas produced the illustrative graphics.

Finally, we must thank our friends and family. They may now have heard enough of Dictators Without Borders, but without their support and sacrifices this project would have not come to fruition.

1 Kazakh oligarch Mukhtar Ablyazov in Almaty, 2006.

2 Kazakhstan President Nursultan Nazarbayev at the Astana Economic Forum, 2013.

3 Tajikistan President Emomali Rahmon and US Secretary of State John Kerry at the Palace of Nations in Dushanbe, Tajikistan, for a bilateral meeting in 2015.

4 The Tajik Aluminium Company (Talco), located in Tursunzade, Tajikistan.

5 President Rahmon's growing family in 2011. Including the in-laws, the family is much larger.

6 Uzbekistan's first president Islam Karimov with John Kerry in Samarkand, 2015.

7 Gulnara Karimova at the World Economic Forum in Jordan, 2009.

8 TeliaSonera's offices in Sweden, 2012.

9 President Kurmanbek Bakiyev of Kyrgyzstan with Donald Rumsfeld in 2005.

10 Maxim Bakiyev and officials from Kyrgyzstan's Central Agency for Development and Investment, 2009.

11 Tajik opposition leader Umarali Kuvvatov, who was assassinated in Istanbul in March 2015.

12 David Nazarov, son of Obidkhon qori Nazarov, at a demonstration following the assassination attempt on his father in Sweden, 2013.