Acknowledgments

This book, more than most, is a coterie production. It is the result of many years of discussions with Yale and Chicago undergraduate and graduate students, innumerable conversations with friends and colleagues, and many a family dinner. While I put the ideas on paper, many people were responsible for the interesting thoughts that are in this book. The boring ones are all my own.

I would like to thank the many people who have discussed these issues, read draft chapters, or simply stimulated me to rethink assumptions and correct mistakes. This book took shape, by accident, very quickly. The initial stimulus came from an invitation by Doug Bradburn, founding director of the Fred W. Smith National Library for the Study of George Washington, to present a public lecture on the British influences on George Washington. This book is the working out of the ideas I presented boldly at Mount Vernon. I benefited much from the criticism I received at that event. At the same time, I held fellowships from the John Simon Guggenheim Memorial Foundation and from the Dorothy and Lewis B. Cullman Center for Scholars and Writers. It was in the latter remarkable setting that

I conducted most of the research for this project and also had the privilege of testing my ideas formally and informally with a fantastic group of journalists, novelists, and academics. To all of them, and especially to the director Jean Strouse, I am more grateful than they could possibly know.

Chris Rogers at Yale University Press and Wendy Strothman both played key roles in persuading me that this was a project worth pursuing.

I have benefited from discussions with many, many scholars in the past several years. I had the opportunity to present some of my ideas in seminars, lectures, and workshops at the American Historical Association, New York University, Binghamton University, Cambridge University, Dundee University, the Huntington Library, the Institute of Historical Research in London, the London School of Economics, the McNeil Center at the University of Pennsylvania, NYU Law School, Ohio State University, Rutgers University, the University of Texas at Arlington, and the Center for Historical Enquiry and the Social Sciences at Yale. At each of these events I received suggestions and criticism that made me rethink or recalibrate the claims advanced here.

I am especially grateful to those who read draft chapters and offered pointed criticism. David Blight, John Brooke, Christian Burset, Alejandra Dubcovsky, Joanne Freeman, Bruce Gordon, Don Herzog, Alan Houston, Dan Hulsebosch, Jim Livesey, Peter Mancall, Paul Mapp, Renaud Morieux, Isaac Nakhimovsky, Bill Novak, Jim Oakes, Claire Priest, Ed Rugemer, and Mark Somos all provided comments that, I hope, made the manuscript better. Chris Rogers, Alyssa Reichardt, and Justin du Rivage read every word several times over and offered suggestions that often transformed chapters. Catherine Arnold provided a thorough and vital final reading of the prose. My wife read every turgid word and made suggestions to make the prose less so. To them I am exceedingly grateful. Conversations with John Brewer, Don Herzog, Jim Livesey, Frank Trentmann, and James Vaughn all helped shape my thinking in fundamental ways.

While he never read a word of this book manuscript, my graduate supervisor, Wallace MacCaffrey, shaped this book in important ways. His gentle and persistent prodding to ask big questions was always in the back of my mind. His humane and sympathetic guidance will always serve as a model. He is missed.

My greatest thanks goes to my family. They put up with many archival forays and trips to Charleston, London, and Paris, among many other places. They also cheered me up when some of the intellectual puzzles seemed too difficult to crack. David, now eleven, kept pointing out things about my story that I did not know. Andy persistently and usefully asked when the book would be done. Our newest family member, Avalanche, kept up my spirits in the race to the finish line. My greatest debt is owed to Sue, who was vital in too many ways to count.
