Acknowledgments

In one way or another much of what I've written about over the years has involved the role of class in American history. I might have come up with the idea of writing about why class matters on my own. But I didn't. Steve Wasserman, then an editor at Yale University Press, suggested I tackle this subject. I had known Steve through his various incarnations as a discerning editor and literary agent. When he broached this, I knew I wanted to give it a try. But I wasn't sure how to approach the project. I threw out a slew of ideas about how I might go about it and Steve was my first sounding board. So I am grateful to him both for the genesis of this book and for helping me through this period of what I hope turned out be productive confusion.

Others were equally helpful in listening, criticizing, and offering their own ideas about how to grapple with a topic that offered up almost too many tempting ways in. My long-time friends Josh Freeman and Paul Milkman were among those early listeners and commentators. I have relied on their judgment for every book I've written. That is true as well of my wife Jill. I also called on the three of them again to read and criticize initial fragments and whole drafts of some of the first chapters as well as for other advice and help once the book was complete. My good friend Rochelle Gurstein also read some early material and as always provided sharp, sympathetic criticism. When I had about half the book drafted I grew nervous about the approach I had adopted. I asked another friend Marshall Rafal, and two superb historians, Elaine May and Nelson Lichtenstein, to react to what I had done. They did so with alacrity, and combined critical commentary with encouragement that the approach I had chosen seemed to be working.

When I had a complete draft in hand, Yale University Press asked the distinguished historian Gary Gerstle to provide the Press with a critical reading. He produced a wonderfully inciteful and sympathetic critique and then subsequently shared with me the knowledge that he was its author. Gary is not only a talented writer and historian, but an editor as well; indeed, he and I have edited two books of essays together. Class Matters benefited immensely from all these readings, but especially from Gary's.

Many people I don't know or barely know-scholars and laymen alike—made indispensable contributions to this book. Class Matters covers six subjects about none of which can I pretend to have expert knowledge. Without the work of historians, social scientists, and journalists whose work is cited in the endnotes there is no way I could have written this book.

Other good friends helped along the way in discussing possible titles, jacket designs, and other matters dear to an author who is also a once, and now and then still an editor. Thanks to Robert Boyers, Tom Engelhardt, Corey Robin, and Geoff Shandler as well as a good number of the people I've already thanked above.

I am in debt of course to several people at Yale University Press. When Steve Wasserman left Yale for another publishing position, Yale's Editorial Director Seth Ditchik graciously took over the project. I have valued his advice and warm support for my orphaned book. His assistant Michael Deneen has been unfailingly responsive to every noodling question and anxiety that impatient and anxious authors often are apt to express. Robin DuBlanc is a superb copyeditor and also knows how to hold the hand of a self-doubting writer. Margaret Otzel epitomized professionalism in her work as the book's production editor and, like Robin, made that production process seem less impersonal than it sometimes can. I want to thank as well my publicist Brenda King. And finally at Yale I want to thank Mary Valencia for her perceptive visualization of the book's mood and purpose in her design of the book's dust jacket.

As always, my family has been my most precious asset. They helped in specific ways, but most of all by being there for me. Without Jill there would be no books nor much of what I value. My son Max and his wife Elena are dear to me, not least for bringing into the world my brand-new granddaughter Sabina who is hilarious and a thrill. I can't imagine my life without my daughter Emma. My brother Jon and his husband Marco have enriched my life and the family's in so many ways. And to that group I must add my last remaining uncle, Arthur Oluwek who shared with me information and memories of his father, my grandfather, that find their way into Chapter 3. To all of them thanks is scarcely enough.
