

Acknowledgments

This book owes most of its ideas and inspiration to innumerable discussions and debates with advisors, colleagues, friends, and students over the past decade. Any interesting conclusions and stimulating arguments it contains are likely the result of the good company I've kept over the years; the rest is no one's fault but my own. I would like to take this opportunity to thank many of the people who have discussed this book's ideas and chapter drafts with me.

This work began life as a doctoral dissertation at the University of Chicago, where brilliant advisors and fellow students taught me most of what I know about British and imperial history. I owe an intellectual debt too large to ever repay to my supervisor, Steve Pincus, who taught me to ask big questions and to answer them as boldly and clearly as possible. Having spent the past few years teaching and advising graduate students, I look back in awe at the amount of time Steve devoted to discussing my ideas and arguments, however silly and half-baked they were. In addition to serving on my dissertation committee and providing invaluable commentary on every chapter, Ralph Austen pressed me to think beyond "little England" and to place my historical work in a global context. I'm grateful that Ralph remains a mentor to this day. I was fortunate to take a seminar on Jacobitism with a visiting professor, Alan MacInnes. Alan provided crucial advice and suggestions at every stage of this project, suffering my Whiggish inclinations with good humor along the way. Bob Brenner kindly agreed to serve as an external reviewer for my dissertation. He rose above our sectarian disagreements to provide invaluable advice for sharpening my arguments.

The wider community of faculty and graduate students at Chicago helped shape this book's ideas in seminars, workshops, and less formal settings. Foremost among them were Brent Sirota, Pablo Ben, Adrian Johns, Abigail Swingen, Chris Dudley, Heather Welland, Fredrik Albritton Jonsson, David Lyons, Lyman Stebbins, Spencer Leonard, Chris Cutrone, Sunit Singh, Atiya Khan, and Andrew Sartori. I especially wish to thank Brent Sirota and Pablo Ben. I have spent an inordinate amount of time with Brent discussing and debating British history. All of my thinking about the field bears the stamp of his ideas. Since my first day of graduate school, Pablo has pressed me to be a more intellectually capacious and conceptually rigorous historian. I was never able to adequately answer many of the questions he posed about my book manuscript, but I believe my attempts to do so have much improved the work.

I spent a year in residence at the University of London's Institute for Historical Research while working on my dissertation. In addition to providing research assistance and weekly seminars, the Institute introduced me to Peter Marshall, who spent many hours discussing ideas and guiding me through the vast holdings of the Oriental and India Office Collections at the British Library. Although Peter will disagree with some of this book's conclusions, they would never have been reached without his patient support and helpful suggestions over the years.

I could not have asked for a better beginning to my career than teaching and working in the history department at the University of Texas at Austin. My countless discussions with undergraduate and graduate students prompted me to rethink my assumptions about British, European, and imperial history. My colleagues Brian Levack and Mark Metzler read several different versions of this manuscript and provided expert criticisms and suggestions for improving it. I benefited time and again from the vital feedback and support provided by Al Martinez, Judy Coffin, Erika Bsumek, Bob Olwell, Tracie Matysik, George Forgie, Philippa Levine, Roger Louis, and Jorge Cañizares-Esguerra. During my first years in Austin, I was fortunate to have Tony Hopkins as a colleague. Tony let me bounce my ideas around his office; many of those ideas originated in his own work on the history of British imperialism. This book owes much to his good cheer and great advice, as well as his putting a bit of stick about when the situation called for it.

The book manuscript was made possible by financial support from the Institute for Historical Studies and the College of Liberal Arts at the University of Texas at Austin. It never would have been completed without a research fellowship at Yale University's MacMillan Center for International and Area Studies during the 2011–2012 academic year. While I was at Yale, Steve Pincus introduced me to a remarkable community of faculty, graduate students, and local residents who discussed issues and ideas with me and read chapter drafts. I would like to thank Keith Wrightson, Megan Lindsay Cherry, James Caudle, Steve Alderman, Haydon Cherry, and Mara Caden for providing me with an intellectual home away from home during my time in New Haven.

I received helpful comments and criticisms after presenting sections of this book at conferences, workshops, and invited lectures over the years. These include the North American Conference on British Studies, the Southern Conference on British Studies, the Mellon Consortium Conference on British History, the Faculty Seminar in British Studies at the University of Texas at Austin, the Economies of Empire Conference at the Huntington Library, the Buffett Center for International and Comparative Studies at Northwestern University, Nuffield College at the University of Oxford, the British Historical Studies Colloquium at Yale University, the Triangle Global British History Seminar at the National Humanities Center, the Institute for Historical Studies at the University of Texas at Austin, and the Early Modern Empires Workshop at Yale University.

At Yale University Press, I would like to thank Jaya Chatterjee for her expert assistance and kindly support. She has patiently guided me through every step of the process of completing and submitting my manuscript, despite my constant delays and dithering. I'm grateful for her time and consideration.

Last but not least, I would like to thank my family. My parents, Joyce and Ted Vaughn, have unfailingly supported me throughout every stage of putting this book together. I hope they know how much their support has meant. My sister and brother-in-law, Nicole and Matt Manasse, have encouraged me at every step. My little niece Adeline kept me in good spirits as I completed this book, allowing me to work on my laptop for brief interludes between playing games. Finally, my dog Max provided a sounding board for my (mostly bad) ideas on our long walks over the past three years—of course, the fact that he can't speak probably helped.
