

Acknowledgments

Work on this book began with an NEH fellowship at the Albright Institute of Archaeological Research in Jerusalem. In addition to financial support, this institute has provided a base for my research and study in Israel for many years. Its directors, Seymour Gitin and now Matthew Adams, have been supportive as well as helpful with advice and contacts. Colleagues resident at the Albright have been valuable conversation partners. The support of the National Endowment of the Humanities has been essential for this research and is gratefully acknowledged.

Research leaves from the Methodist Theological School in Ohio (MTSO) made this work possible. MTSO has been a good home for my continuing research, and I thank its presidents, Norman Dewire and Jay Rundell, for providing for this support as well as for an environment which values this academic work.

Students at MTSO contributed to the completion of this work. Katya Broadbeck and Joel Wildermuth, talented and diligent student assistants, made significant contributions. There are more students who labored through my Matthew seminars than I can name. These seminars were one of the contexts in which the ideas of this volume developed. I thank them for their willingness to listen to these ideas (as if they had a choice) and for their comments.

Academic colleagues in the International Organization of Qumran Studies have heard many papers on the subjects covered in this volume. Readers will understand why and how scholars of the study of the Dead Sea Scrolls were significant conversation partners in a work on Matthew. Colleagues in both the Qumran and Matthew sections of the Society of Biblical Literature also provided valuable feedback to the many papers that were delivered on the topics discussed.

Research for this volume rested on the support of libraries and librarians. Paul Burnam and David Powell at MTSO not only worked diligently to provide access to the necessary materials, they also made necessary acquisitions to support this research. Expanding the library's holdings in Qumran studies assisted the work on this volume, as well as work in this area by the students of MTSO. The Athenaeum of Ohio in Cincinnati also facilitated access to required materials on a regular basis. The cooperation of these libraries in the OPAL and OhioLINK networks makes my work possible. The libraries and librarians of the Klau Library of Hebrew Union College–Jewish Institute of Religion in Cincinnati have supported my research for the past forty years. This remarkable collection is a scholar's dream. The librarians respond to all suggestions to help ensure the comprehensiveness of the collection. Dr. David Gilner, its recently retired director, supported this project, as he has all of my research projects.

The staff of Yale University Press has been a generous, supportive, and patient presence throughout the research, writing, and production of this volume. From Jennifer Banks, the editor who first contracted the volume, to Heather Gold, the editor who saw it through to final production, the combination of professionalism and support has been extraordinary. It has been a delight to work with Heather Gold. The work of production editor Susan Laity and copyeditor Debra Corman was extraordinary. Their diligent attention is greatly appreciated.

I express deepest gratitude to the editor of the Anchor Yale Bible Reference Library, John Collins. From the development of the initial proposal to his assistance in producing a clear and concise manuscript, John's analytical abilities, mastery of the field, literary skill, and careful editorial work contributed greatly to the present work.

Academic work is demanding in terms of time and commitment. I have been fortunate to have siblings scattered across the provinces of western Canada who have been supportive while recognizing the need for me to be elsewhere, frequently preoccupied with research and deadlines. They are a generous, loving lot.

My wife of twenty years, Carol Lehman, came into the midst of my academic life and nurtured its continued growth. On a daily basis she provides the support necessary to continue this work. Her encouragement certainly helped in the completion of this manuscript. Her interest in the research, the many lectures she has attended, and her company, whether traveling for research or ensconced in my home study, help retain the joy and pleasure to be found in academic labor. I am fortunate that this accomplished woman shares her life with mine. To her this book is dedicated.
