Umberto Eco once argued that “what we become depends on what our fathers teach us at odd moments, when they aren’t trying to teach us.” While it pains me to admit, this book grew out of one such odd moment with my father. Sometime in my youth during a visit to Chuck E. Cheese’s, my father, an avid reader of military histories, told me a factoid that meant little to me then. Without prompting and likely in response to my requests for more pizza or quarters, he told me that the famed French general, Napoleon Bonaparte, passed the first laws against marijuana in modern history in the early 1800s. I immediately forgot about it, likely sulked, and didn’t think of that moment again until graduate school.

As it turns out, my father was wrong about Napoleon. And the many people and academic institutions who helped me prove him wrong and write this book deserve much credit.

Thank you to my parents, Bill and Donna Ferguson, and to my sister, Kelsey, for their constant love and encouragement. Many thanks to my aunts, Christine and Beth, for their prayers and support, particularly during my moments of down and doubt.

I thank Richard Baggaley of McGill-Queen’s University Press for his immediate and enduring enthusiasm for this project. Thank you, as well, to Todd Shepard, Jim Mills, and the other referees, whose insights and critiques much improved the manuscript. Any oversights or oversteps are my own or the result of not heeding all their advice. And many, many thanks to the members of the Alcohol and Drugs History Society, their journal Social History of Alcohol and Drugs (SHAD), and their wonderfully engaging conferences and public forums, all of which have helped improve and promote my research these past few years.

Numerous professors through the years have inspired me and helped me become the historian and educator I am today. Julian Bourg's passion and compassion as a history professor at Bucknell University convinced me to pursue a career in the field. At Villanova University, R. Emmet McLaughlin, Marc Gallicchio, and Paul Steege taught me to read, think, and write like a historian. Petra Goedde, Richard Immerman, and Jay Lockenour masterfully guided me through course work, taught me how to teach, and provided tireless and patient support throughout my time at Temple University.

Thank you, as well, to Bryant Simon, Temple's Initiative to Globalize the Study of US History (GUSS), and Jean-Michel Yvard and the American Studies Department of the Université d'Angers for funding a two-year lecturer position in France, where I taught and completed much of the research for this book from 2014 to 2016. And many thanks to Mark Pollack and Temple's Global Studies Program for their generous research grant during the summer of 2017, which allowed me to return to France and tidy up some loose ends.

Several colleagues and friends in Philadelphia, Angers, Paris, and Baltimore likewise deserve recognition for putting up with me. Robert Terrell, Matthew Shannon, Carly Goodman, Stephanie Vogt, Michael Harrigan, and Joshua Ellis – I cannot think of Philly without thinking of you; thank you for your patience and friendship, particularly when I was impatient and unfriendly. Emily Guernsey, Lilly Robert-Foley, Pierre-Louis Coudray, Niall Curry, Jennifer Layton, Maxime Rallet – France would have eaten me up without you all. Thank you for your hospitality and friendship.

In Baltimore I have been fortunate to teach an ambitious group of students at Bard High School Early College; they have offered me sincerest encouragement throughout this project and time and again confirmed its value and importance. Three years of living and working in Baltimore City has opened my eyes in ways that decades of formal education never could. The experience of working with my students and their families has provided this illumination, and for that I am forever grateful. Thank you, as well, to Bard Early Colleges for giving me the opportunity to help build a school in Baltimore and for supporting my development as both an educator and a scholar these past three years.

A final thanks to my fiancé, Christeen Roden, and her amazingly supportive and loving family. I'm certain I wouldn't have finished or survived any of this without you.
