

Acknowledgments

For the past decade, I have nurtured this project from its humble infancy as a thesis, to its adolescence as a dissertation, and finally, to its adulthood as a book. But, over this decade, I have not been alone in supporting its maturation. I owe a debt of gratitude to several individuals and organizations that provided me with financial and mentoring support. First, the History Department and the College of Humanities and Social Sciences (CHASS) at Utah State University generously funded the completion and publication of this book. In addition to a semester off from teaching to finish writing this book, the History Department and CHASS have funded publication workshops, archival trips, and conference presentations and provided excellent mentoring.

Additionally, the Institute for Historical Studies at The University of Texas at Austin, where I held an inaugural postdoctoral research fellowship in 2015–16, provided me with an entire academic year to convert my dissertation into an initial manuscript for submission. The Department of History and the Graduate School at The University of Texas at Austin, as well, awarded me a prestigious Named/Endowed Dissertation Completion Fellowship to finish my dissertation and full funding through my doctoral program.

Several organizations and archives awarded my project research fellowships at different stages. The American Historical Association's Bernadotte E. Schmitt Grant for Research in European, African, or Asian History as well as a Newberry Library Short-Term Research Fellowship sponsored my final stages of research at the Newberry Library in 2017. The Omohundro Institute of Early American History & Culture invited me to present at their annual colloquia in 2019. The Society for French Historical Studies Marjorie M. and Lancelot L. Farrar Memorial Award for the Best Dissertation in Progress at a North American University and the American Society for Eighteenth-Century Studies Robert R. Palmer Research Travel Award provided essential funds to undertake research in 2012 and 2013. The Mellon Foundation underwrote my participation in the Newberry Library's French Paleography course that made archival research a feasible endeavour. The archivists and librarians at the archives I visited deserve recognition here as well. The Archives Départementales du Rhône and the Archives Municipales de Lyon, in particular, were so accommodating and helpful to an early career researcher.

Additionally, McGill-Queen's University Press (MQUP) has been a pleasure to work with for my first book. My editor Kyla Madden provided much guidance and advice. Her helpful conversations about the use of the term "agency" and "childhood" have made this work better. Shelagh Plunkett served as an excellent copy editor. My deepest thanks to the two anonymous readers. Their comments, thoughts, and queries helped to create a stronger analytical framework. Thank you.

One of the best decisions I have made in life was to study under Julie Hardwick at The University of Texas at Austin. As all of her former students will attest to, Julie is one of the kindest mentors and also one of the most demanding. She prepares her students to be entrepreneurial. It equips them well for their lives as professional historians. Julie is my fiercest professional advocate, one of my strongest cheerleaders, and one of my most trusted advisors. I am so deeply appreciative of the professional and personal bonds Julie has sewn with me.

Gratitude is also due to my undergraduate advisor Kathleen Wellman who inspired a love of French history in me when I enrolled in a freshman honours seminar on "French Queens and Mistresses" at Southern Methodist University. I am so grateful to have been Kathleen's program assistant and assistant director for seven summers at SMU-in-Paris. Not only were these some of the most enjoyable summers I've had but they provided me with access to the archives at critical stages. Thank you to Kathleen as well for her continued support and encouragement of my academic career and personal ambitions.

Dozens of colleagues and friends have read and discussed parts of this book at various stages, providing feedback and ideas. For their generosity of time and intellect, I thank Bianca Premo, Alison Frazier, Brian Levack, Robert Olwell, Neil Kamil, Marc Bizer, Chris Corley, Steven Mintz, Clare Crowston, Dena Goodman, Susan Desan, Jeffrey Merrick, Karin Wulf, Holly White, Ashley Bruckbauer, Laurie Wood, Meghan Roberts, Danna Agmon, Katie Jarvis, Anne Verjus, Alan Kahan, Courtney Meador, Katherine Godwin, Shaz Ahmadi, Christopher Rose, Peter Hamilton, Alex Truax, Ben Breen, Samantha Rubino, Jacob Doss, Natalie Cincotta, Eddie Watson, and Alexander Taft. Several of my colleagues at Utah State University, especially the Works in Progress Group, have provided helpful advice on chapters: Tammy Proctor, Joe Ward, James Sanders, Victoria Grieve, Norm Jones, Fran Titchener, Lawrence Culver, Patrick Mason, Dan McNerney, Angela Diaz, Jeannie Sur, Dominic Sur, Felipe Valencia, Seth Archer, Eliza Rosenberg, and Rebecca Andersen. Two of my undergraduate students also helped in the statistical analysis of data through summer mentorship grants: Arie French and Zion Steiner. As it takes a village, I certainly will have forgotten someone. Thank you to all my friends and colleagues.

The first reader of this manuscript was my husband, Chris Babits. In addition to being a supportive, loving, and hilarious husband, Chris is one of my most trusted writing partners. He caught every missing or errant comma. I love going through life and through history with you. Thank you, too, to my closest friends Jessica McLoughlin and Natalie Akilian Harrell. Our friendships have kept me laughing and joyful since we were young.

And finally, thank you to my most benevolent and dedicated patrons, Dawn-L and Jim Gossard. In many ways, this book is also yours. You both steadfastly encouraged me throughout my life to follow my passions. Even in 2008 as I graduated college at the start of a global financial collapse, you supported my decision to pursue a PhD. In fact, you helped me to obtain funding and to thrive during my time in Austin, Lyon, and Paris. I am so thankful for our relationship, your unwavering support of my career, and daily encouragement. Mom, you have always pushed me to challenge myself. This has made me into the woman I am today. I am so happy that I got to share Lyon with you in 2012, and I hope you'll remember walking through the old city with me on the way back from our pizza place laughing about the early modern drunkards. Dad, one of the most valuable lessons you taught me was how to write a creative introduction to an assignment about my summer vacation in first grade. I teach my students that lesson now, passing down the wisdom and creativity. Though I haven't sent you an essay to look at in a while, I still consider you one of my greatest and most enthusiastic critics. I love you both. Thank you.

I would also like to acknowledge the immense historical moment that has shaded the revisions of this book: the 2020 COVID-19 global pandemic. As of today, 24 May 2020, the United States has lost more than 100,000 individuals to the virus and 350,000 people have died across the globe. In some ways it seems unfathomable that I have concentrated on revising this manuscript while fearful of catching the virus, anxious about the economy, and afraid for my family, friends, and strangers alike. Yet, for me work as well as history have always been places of solace in difficult times. I am reminded, too, of the massive role that disease has played in the past. Though not discussed in this work, many of the children I study were quarantined at different points in their lives as the bubonic plague and other pestilence spread through Lyon and Paris, causing extreme economic, social, and political fallout. But, those societies adapted, learned, and continued to thrive. I hope that we can learn from the past (including the very recent past), listen to the scientists, wear our masks, be personally responsible, and that by the time this book appears in print, COVID-19 is history.
