

Acknowledgments

THIS book project has benefited from the generosity of many people and institutions over the past decade, and I am most grateful for this support. Grants from both private and federal institutions enabled me to undertake the multiple field research trips to India that were essential for this project, as well as to make repeat visits to Shirdi Sai Baba temples in Chicago and Austin in the United States. I owe sincere thanks to the American Academy of Religion, the American Council of Learned Societies, the American Institute of Indian Studies, the National Endowment for the Humanities (NEH), and the Wabash Center for Teaching and Learning in Theology and Religion for this material support. My home institution, Bucknell University, also supported my research with a yearlong sabbatical leave in 2012–13, which enabled me to devote one academic year to extensive reflection and writing, and with the award of an NEH endowed chair from 2012 to 2015 as well as an international summer research travel grant.

In my field research for this book, I have employed a multisited methodological approach, which means that I have many people to thank for support in several locations. In Shirdi, warmest thanks to Kishore More, Jitendra Shelke, Mohan Yadav, and Mita Diwan for opening doors and answering questions at the pilgrimage complex. In New Delhi and Gurgaon, I extend my gratitude to C. B. and Meera Satpathy, Kumkum Bhatia, Saurabh Vatsa, Sangeeta, and Azadram for patiently showing me around temples and answering questions. I extend heartfelt thanks to all those who opened their homes to me in India, including Madhu Malik and Gunmala Kapur and her family in New Delhi; Niru and Harshad Vasa in Mumbai; and Ganesh Shivaswamy and his family as well as Reena I. Puri and her family in Bengaluru. I must also thank S. A. Joshi and Geeta Ramana at the University of Mumbai for their professional hospitality. I am also immensely grateful for the logistical support provided by the American Institute of Indian Studies on my multiple trips to India, especially to Elise Auerbach in the Chicago office, Purnima Mehta and staff in the New Delhi office, and Madhav Bhandare in the Pune office. I also thank Mukund Raj, who not only welcomed me into the Chicago temple but also opened many doors for me in Shirdi. In Austin, I am grateful to Craig Sastry Edwards and Jill Yogini Edwards and to the “sandwich seva” team. In all of these locations, I am grateful to the many devotees who agreed to speak with me about their faith in Shirdi Sai Baba.

Earlier versions of some chapters were presented at the invitation of the South Asia Institute at the University of Texas at Austin, the South Asian Studies Program at the University of Missouri, and the Religion Department at Bard College, as well as at multiple conferences, including that of the Association for Asian Studies, the Conference on the Study of Religions of India held at Drew University, the annual South Asia conference at the University of Wisconsin, and special themed conferences hosted at Denison University, the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, and Wabash College. I thank all of my colleagues in South Asian studies and religious studies who heard these presentations and responded with constructive criticism.

I am indebted to many scholars who read earlier drafts of one or more chapters and who offered advice, encouragement, and support along the way. In my department this includes my colleagues Maria Antonaccio, Brantley Gasaway, Rivka Ulmer, Carol Wayne White, and Stuart Young; I am also grateful to Kara van Buskirk for administrative support. Also at Bucknell I must thank Andrew Black, Isabel Cunado, John Enyeart, Michael Rabinder James, Susan Reed, and Amanda Wooden. Beyond Bucknell, I extend my heartfelt gratitude to Richard Davis, Corinne Dempsey, William Elison, Janice Leoshko, Philip Lutgendorf, Christian Novetzke, Patrick Olivelle, Karen Pechilis, Polly Roberts, Angela Rudert, Martha Ann Selby, and Joanne Punzo Waghorne for many conversations about Shirdi Sai Baba over the years and for helpful comments on my work in progress at different stages.

I have many folks to thank at the University of Washington Press, including my acquisitions editor, Ranjit Arab, for his enthusiasm for this project and his prompt professionalism; Jacqueline Volin and Nancy Cortelyou for seeing the book through all phases of production; and Julie Van Pelt, an excellent copy editor. I also thank the Global South Asia series editors for their support: Padma Kaimal, K. Sivaramakrishnan, and Anand Yang. I am extremely grateful to the two anonymous readers for their expertise and advice. I must also thank Diane Jakacki and Janine Glatzer in Bucknell University's Library and Information Technology Department, who produced the maps featured in this book. I also gratefully acknowledge the Arts and Sciences Dean's Office at Bucknell for providing material support at the indexing stage, and I thank Scott Smiley for compiling the index for this book. Jayita Prashant Sinha, then a graduate student at the University of Texas at Austin, worked as my research assistant in the summer of 2013, during which time she helpfully produced rough translations of several chapters of Athavale's Marathi biography of Das Ganu Maharaj.

Finally, my deepest thanks to my family and friends for their intellectual and emotional support in the years that I have worked on this book. Among these, I must mention my triple debt to my mom, who provided welcome companionship at some temple rituals and needed child care while I attended others; to Jonathan, who joined me for parts of my field research and who endured my absences at other times, who carefully read and commented on much of this manuscript, and who can be counted on for steadfast encouragement; and to Curran, who knew the face and name of Sai Baba by the time he was one year old and whose adventurous spirit rejuvenates me.
