

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

THIS BOOK, nearly three years in the making, is the product of a stimulating collaboration sponsored by The Andrew W. Mellon Foundation. While the contributors have been together in one place only once—at the March 1996 Princeton Conference on Higher Education (jointly sponsored by Princeton University and Mellon)—we have been in regular communication in order to advance and present this discussion in publishable form. The Foundation has generously supported the process of moving from conference proceedings to published book in more ways than can be counted.

In a formal and personal sense, my thanks go first to William G. Bowen and Harold T. Shapiro, the two Princeton presidents under whom I served as dean of students from 1983 to 1993. Much of the material that has found its way into Promise and Dilemma is rooted in what I learned during that decade. As president of The Andrew W. Mellon Foundation, William Bowen has continued to support and encourage this work as well as to urge me to find simpler ways to express my thoughts. My thanks to him and to the Foundation for their patience as I completed this work in the midst of other responsibilities. I wish also to thank my former Princeton colleagues in the Office of the Dean of Students and the Office of the Dean of the College in whose company I initially explored many of the questions that underlie this book.

Jennifer Hochschild, Sheldon Hackney, and a reader for Princeton University Press critically reviewed the manuscript and recommended its publication while also making important suggestions for improving it. My long-time friend and colleague, Nancy Weiss Malkiel, Dean of the College and professor of history, gave Part I a very careful reading.

In the preparation of the manuscript and in the coordination of communication among the contributors, I have been helped from the beginning by Dorothy Westgate of the Princeton office of The Andrew W. Mellon Foundation. My Northwestern-based assistant, Mary Bucholtz, also provided invaluable assistance in the latter stages of manuscript revision.

The initial planning for this project took place as I was completing a term of service at Princeton's Department of Religion and preparing to move to Northwestern. I am grateful for the support of colleagues at what was my academic base for twelve years. This project moved with me to Northwestern University a few months before the Princeton Conference. The bulk of the work, therefore, has been completed in Evanston, where I have enjoyed the support of, and learned from, a new group of administrative and faculty colleagues. I wish to convey my particular thanks to Henry Bienen, president of Northwestern, and Lawrence Dumas, provost of Northwestern, for their encouragement of this work.

I am also indebted to Princeton University Press, particularly to Walter Lippincott and Peter Dougherty, for their counsel and support during the review process. Karen Fortgang of bookworks has provided critical energy and focus in the final stages of manuscript preparation.

I wish finally to thank my wife, Jane Pataky Henderson, who has been a patient believer that this project would one day be complete, and our children for their abiding tolerance of my divided attention.
