

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

THERE ARE MANY PEOPLE to thank over the years it took for this book to come to fruition. I almost don't know where to begin. First, thank you to my undergraduate advisors at Barnard College—Kathryn Jay and Bruce Lenthall. Both encouraged and supported my dream of becoming a historian while aptly warning of the risks involved in pursuing a doctorate in a dwindling academic market. At Barnard, I wrote a senior thesis under the direction of Bruce Lenthall, which bears some links to what eventually became this book. At Barnard and Columbia University, I was also lucky to take courses with many eminent historians who inspired my love of American history, among them Alan Brinkley, Eric Foner, and Rosalind Rosenberg.

A kernel of what became Write Like a Man began as a dissertation at Northwestern University. I wish to thank my stellar committee: Nancy MacLean, Mark Bradley, Tony Michels, Kirsten Fermaglich, and especially my advisor, Michael Sherry, who taught me so much about the craft of history and the art of writing. With unceasing patience and humor, he put up with my many “one last” questions, often outside of his office hours. A model scholar and intellectual, Sherry is also caring and kind, and I am so grateful to have had him as a mentor. I also wish to thank Henry Binford, John Bushnell, and Alexandra Owen for believing in me as a very tentative graduate student. Thank you to Lane Fenrich, the first person I ever TAed for. An amazing and dynamic lecturer, I learned so much watching Lane in action and also found a kindred yoga spirit. The yoga community Lane helped foster in Chicago kept me sane in graduate school. Thank you to all of them, too.

At Northwestern, a cohort of friends and fellow students made graduate school bearable: Demetra Kasimis (a dear friend and holdover from college), Andreana Prichard, Erin-Marie Legacey, Mary Grace Tyrell, David Sellers Smith, Guy Ortolano, Jenny Mann, and Neil Kodesh and Shanee Ellison. Neil and Shanee moved to Madison shortly after I arrived but opened their home to me whenever I needed to escape Evanston. Special thanks to Stephen Mak and Zachary Jacobson. Stephen was my confidant and dear friend from day one. We did graduate school together. Zach, meanwhile, showed up just when I needed him.

I asked Kirsten Fermaglich and Tony Michels to serve as outside members of my dissertation committee when it became clear how much my project had veered into the field of American Jewish history. Both have served as role models ever since. Tony has an encyclopedic knowledge of the intricacies of radicalism and has become a sounding board for all things related to Jewish and intellectual history. Kirsten welcomed me into her home in East Lansing, Michigan when I was still a graduate student so I could take a summer course with her on American Jewish history. Over the course of that summer, as I commuted from Chicago to East Lansing, she became a true friend and rock of support. I had first met Kirsten at a conference at New York University on “The Jewish Feminine Mystique,” where I also met Shira Kohn and Rachel Kranson. Both have since become cherished colleagues. Special thank you to Shira, who took me under her wing and helped me navigate the world of Jewish Studies. Shira became a good friend who I still turn to for professional advice, as well as tasty dinners in Manhattan. Through them I met David Weinfeld, now a go-to collaborator when it comes to conference panels. It was Weinfeld who first convinced me to attend the Society for U.S. Intellectual History’s annual conference, which has since become an academic home of sorts. Two stalwarts of that group, Andrew Hartman and Kevin Schultz, have been especially supportive of my work. I actually first met Kevin at a conference in Israel. Kevin read and commented on my first article and encouraged me to think big. It’s a message that has stayed with me. Both Andrew and Kevin graciously shared my book proposal with editors at various presses. After I settled with Princeton, Josh Lambert read my entire manuscript and offered invaluable critiques. I wish to also thank the other anonymous reviewer who provided incisive feedback, which greatly improved this book. Thank you also to Stacie Taranto, who I met at a graduate school conference many years ago, and Brian Rosenwald for more recently helping sharpen some of the arguments in this book as editors of the Washington Post, Made By History blog.

After Northwestern, I spent two years as a postdoctoral fellow at the University of Colorado at Boulder. That position was made possible by the inestimable David Shneer (z”l), may his memory be a blessing. There are not enough words to thank David, a brilliant scholar and true mensch, from whom I learned so much about how to be an effective teacher and public-facing intellectual. I know I am just one of the many people David touched over the course of his life. I am grateful to have known him and called him a friend. Thank you also to the extraordinary community at CU’s Jewish Studies Program during these years, especially Caryn Aviv, Jamie Polliard, Gregg Drinkwater, and Nick Underwood.

When I moved to Oklahoma, initially for my partner's job, I threw a fit. Little did I know how good Oklahoma would be to me and my own career. A special thank you to Noam Stillman, director emeritus of the Schusterman Center for Judaic and Israel Studies, and Alan Levenson, its current director. Alan saw me give a talk at the Association for Jewish Studies (AJS) conference and arranged for me to give a talk at the Schusterman Center's monthly JuSt Lunch Brown Bag Series. Rob Griswold, then chair of the History Department, attended the talk and thereafter arranged a lectureship for me in the department. Academia is a field that requires a lot of luck; I was very lucky to land in a place where so many people came together to support me.

At the University of Oklahoma I have found a collegial community of scholars in the History Department and beyond. Special thanks to James Hart, our former chair, who always believed that I could write this book, and our current chair, Elyssa Faison, who steadfastly helped me navigate these last few years on the tenure clock, which included a global pandemic. Thank you to the Schusterman Center for Judaic and Israel Studies, especially to Alan Levenson, who has been a fierce advocate and mentor since I got here, and to Tryce Hyman, who holds our program together. Thank you to Committee G, especially Jennifer Davis, who served as my department mentor and has offered much wise advice over the years. Thanks to Christa Seedorf, Janie Adkins, and Danni McCuthchen for all you do. When I first came to OU, I found a supportive writing group in Erica Robb Larkins, Kim Marshall, Dan Emery, Ellen Rubenstein, Sarah Ellis, and Andreana Prichard. Andreana was a good friend from graduate school who welcomed my husband and I to this strange new land in Oklahoma. Thanks, also, to Raphael Folsom, who led a grant-writing workshop for several of us in that group, which generated what turned into a strong book proposal and sharpened my arguments. I'm also grateful for the many good friends I have made at OU: Jennifer Holland, Kathryn Schumaker, Rhona Seidelman, Adam Malka, Rachel Shelden, Jane Wickersham, Sarah Hines, Elyse Singer, and Lauren Duval. I'd also like to thank Sarah Griswold for her steadfast friendship and counsel throughout these years.

Jennifer Holland, Katy Schumaker, Sarah Griswold, and Jennifer Davis provided crucial feedback and editing as I neared completion of the manuscript. Katy read multiple chapters, even while far away in Australia. Jennifer Davis stepped in with key advice on a final chapter and again during the copyediting stage. She and Jennifer Holland read chapters out loud with me to help catch mistakes, a technique we use as editors at the Journal of Women's History. Sarah Griswold and Lauren Duval read and edited multiple chapters using this technique. I am beyond grateful to them and look forward to returning the favor. Finally, thank you to David Chappell. When I was in grad school, I read and admired David's work, never imagining I would one day call him a colleague and friend. David introduced me to numerous editors, including Fred Appel, at Princeton. Moreover, he read every page of this manuscript. He could see what I was trying to say and argue even when the prose was clunky, and I had lost faith in my own abilities to tell the story. A consummate editor with deep knowledge of American intellectual history, David always believed in this project and helped me reach the finish line.

Several institutions, libraries, and archives also deserve special thanks. Through the American Association for Jewish Studies Women's Caucus and its Paula Hyman Mentorship Program, I met Pamela Nadell, who became a mentor in Jewish Studies. Over the years, she has read and commented on draft articles, book proposals, grants, and even my dissertation. Thank you also to Lila Corwin Berman and Steve Weitzman for spearheading an American Academy for Jewish Research Early Career Faculty Workshop. Fellowships from Northwestern University, the Jacob Rader Marcus Center of the American Jewish Archives, the University of Oklahoma, and the Harry Ransom Center at the University of Texas at Austin made archival research possible. Archivists at the Harry Ransom Center and the Columbia University Rare Books and Manuscript Library merit special thanks. Thank you also to Elisheva Urbas, editor extraordinaire, who helped get me past the mental hurdles to complete this book. Thank you to Laura Clark, who did a wonderful job cleaning up the footnotes and to Sam Gainsburg for securing permissions for photos.

Some of my closest and dearest friends allowed me to crash on their couches in New York City and other locales in the early years of this project: Jared Shepard, Sarah Holtze Treadway, Noa Beck, Anna Haykin, and Mirka Feinstein. Lily Pollans and Thacher Tiffany deserve a special thank you, continuing to provide a home away from home when I'm on the East Coast. I also want to thank Faith, Madison, and Mercedes for taking such wonderful care of my children while I worked on this book. With no family in Oklahoma, we had to create our own village to raise our children. Faith, our first nanny, made going back to work seamless. From the moment my daughter smiled big and essentially picked Faith, I knew she was in capable and loving hands. That Faith went on to pursue her own career fills me with joy. Through Faith, we eventually met Mercedes. Mercy spent six wonderful years with our family, including moving with us to Puebla, Mexico with her husband (and assistant "manny") Aaron. Mercy helped raise both my children; her warmth is forever etched in both of them. She is better than Mary Poppins, and there are not enough words to describe how much she means to our family.

Over the course of writing this book, I was able to interview several individuals tied to the New York intellectuals. Midge Decter spoke to me at length in 2011. I am so appreciative that she shared her experiences and answered my probing questions. Thank you to Susan Ferber of Oxford University Press, who encouraged me to reach out to historian David A. Bell. David has graciously shared memories of his parents, read and commented on drafts of the manuscript, as well as kindly contributed family photographs for this book. I was honored when he recommended I appear on a panel with him on the New York intellectuals at the Center for Jewish History, alongside the filmmaker Joseph Dorman, director of Arguing the World (2000), a terrific documentary about this group of intellectuals and a film I have long admired. David also encouraged me to reach out to his cousin, historian Michael Kazin. I had spoken with Michael about his father at an AHA meeting, and he later read and commented on my chapter on Howe and Dissent, as well as the epilogue. I still pinch myself when I think about having the support of these two renowned historians. Thank you to Eric Alterman, who read and commented on my Norman Podhoretz chapter and to Jo-Ann Mort who spoke to me at length about writing for Dissent and her friendship with Irving Howe. Thank you to Joanne Barkan, who also shared her memories of Howe and Dissent when we met in person and over many email conversations. Barkan's incisive comments and editing very much strengthened that chapter. Thank you to Maxine Phillips, who answered questions about Howe over email. Finally, thank you to Judith and Michael Walzer. Here is where I pinch myself once again. Michael and Judy invited me into their home and graciously shared memories of Howe and Dissent. They also read and commented on parts of the manuscript. All mistakes are my own. Undoubtedly, however, this network enriched my book immeasurably.

It was my editor at Princeton University Press, Fred Appel, who encouraged me to reach out to Michael Walzer. Since reading the proposal for this book, Fred has been a steadfast supporter of this project. I could not ask for a more kind, thoughtful, and experienced editor. We have talked about this project over many drinks and meals, and I am so thankful he has been in my corner, always offering sound advice and encouragement. The whole team at PUP has also been terrific. Special thanks to editorial associate James Collier and managing editor Ali Parrington, who so patiently worked with me and shepherded the book through production. As I write this, the PUP design team is working on what I know will be an amazing cover. The artist Ken Krimstein kindly agreed to design a cover image for my book. I've long admired his work and I am ecstatic he took on this project. The stunning image he created for the cover is nothing short of perfect.

Finally, thank you to my family. My brother Itai and sister Anat warrant special thanks. Both of you inspire me. I know I'm not always easy. Thank you for putting up with me and for supporting me. More practically, thank you for entertaining my children as I raced to the finish line to complete this book. That goes to their spouses, too, Eran and Jessamyn. A special thank you to my sister-in-law, Jessamyn, who edited a chapter at the eleventh hour. Thank you to my in-laws Carolyn and Michael Levine, who have long championed my work, and to Eliana and Dina. Big toda to my Israeli family. Thank you also to my stepdad, Yosi, who in his zen-like way has supported me and my family, and who has brought so much joy and happiness to my mom in the second half of her life. I love our big, blended family. Thank you also to Eyal, Jen, Hye-Jeong, Joe, and Maya. Most of all, thank you to my ima—my mom, Rivka. No words can do justice to all she has done for me during the many years it took to complete this book. I am so grateful for her unconditional love, her empathy, her faith in my abilities, and her joy at being a savta. To Paloma and Reuben: Paloma has lived with this book her entire life and is, without a doubt, my biggest cheerleader. At four years old she was drawing pictures of “intellectuals” and in the last couple years she has left so many notes in my office saying, “you can do it” and “I love you, ima.” Reuben was supposed to be child number three, the book being child number two. But when age started to creep up on me, priorities shifted. Reuben entered the world with a bang at the height of the Covid pandemic. With his red hair, infectious smile, and hilarious sense of humor, he completed our family. Finally, to Marc, my partner in life: this book would not have been possible without your love, unceasing support, and yes, your wicked sense of humor. You are my greatest advocate—always reminding me that the tortoise wins the race. There is not a day that goes by that I don't feel so lucky to have found you. This book is for you.
