

Acknowledgements

This book has grown out of nearly four decades of studying, teaching, and researching the history of English, yet its chronological and thematic breadth presented unforeseen and seemingly endless challenges. It is a pleasant duty to recognise the encouragement and support I have received in dealing with these challenges.

My first acknowledgement goes to the University of Edinburgh's Institute for Advanced Studies in the Humanities for an annual Fellowship, giving an East European beginner a career-changing opportunity to benefit from its library resources and invaluable collegial advice and criticism. Angus McIntosh trusted me with my first Middle English classes and Roger Lass let me loose on his Phonology Two students. During that year I started to think of myself as an English Historical Phonologist. The influence of my first teachers will be obvious throughout the book.

I wish to thank UCLA and more specifically the Council on Research and the Center for Medieval and Renaissance Studies for support throughout the lengthy gestation of this book. The Department of English at UCLA has provided a friendly and accommodating working environment and a steady stream of intelligent and demanding students, without whom such work would be barren. My colleagues in the Department of Linguistics at UCLA have always welcomed me in their seminars and discussions; the analytical rigour and innovation in their work sets the bar high and I feel fortunate to be part of that community.

A generous grant from the Arts and Humanities Research Council of Great Britain on 'The Verse Forms of Middle English Romance' has been providing incentives and opportunities for exciting collaborative projects with Ad Putter and Judith Jefferson of the University of Bristol. Some of the results of our ongoing research are cited in this book.

I am grateful to the ETOTEL team at Edinburgh University Press, Esmé Watson, Sarah Edwards, Vicki Donald, Michelle Houston,

Gillian Leslie, James Dale and my copy-editor Eliza Wright for their sustained support in spite of the many delays. I gratefully acknowledge the assistance of Gillan Adler, UCLA, in the preparation of the indexes.

Special thanks go to Heinz Giegerich, the series editor. His much-tested patience, his encouragement and his unfaltering faith in the value of this project helped me persist stubbornly even when I felt that I had exceeded the limits of metaphorical chewing.

Henry Ansgar (Andy) Kelly, medievalist, Latinist, Satanist, philologist, was characteristically observant and generous with his comments on the overlong first draft. I feel lucky that his state of Emeritude has only enhanced his inexhaustible curiosity, attention to detail and spirited collegiality.

This book should have been co-authored with Robert Stockwell. For many years he and I talked about, argued about and wrote about English historical phonology. After 2006 Parkinson's gradually deprived him of his keen eye and the ability to assert his views. Without the productively critical bouncing back-and-forth of drafts with him, completing the project has been a lonely trip. Dedicating this book to Robert is the least I can do for one of the finest contemporary English historical phonologists and the most important person in my life.
