The bulk of the contributions in this volume go back to the international conference ‘The public display of violence in Islamic societies (seventh–eighteenth centuries)’ which was held at the Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas (CSIC) in Madrid (15–16 June 2006). This seminar was made possible thanks to the financial support given by the Spanish Ministry of Education and Science (Acción Complementaria HUM2004-22361-E) and by the CSIC as part of the research project ‘Violencia y castigo en sociedades islámicas pre-modernas: Al-Andalus y el Magreb (Violence and punishment in pre-modern Islamic societies: al-Andalus and the Maghreb)’, which was also funded by the Spanish Ministry of Education and Science (2002–6, BFF2002-00075).

Two contributions in this volume derive from a panel at the 2006 meeting of the Middle East Studies Association titled ‘Punishment and discipline in the Islamic middle ages’ (Boston, 27 November 2006). In the wake of these two events, Robert Gleave, Annliese Nef, Everett Rowson and Mathieu Tillier graciously agreed to come on board and thus give the volume its present shape. The topic at hand is vast. Nevertheless, it is hoped that a satisfying degree of coherence has been achieved, not least by means of the introduction, which lays out a conceptual framework for the volume.

The two anonymous reviewers of the book proposal are owed thanks for their valuable comments and suggestions for improvement of the manuscript. The people at Edinburgh University Press, especially Nicola Ramsey and Eddie Clark, have seen this volume through press with much competence and patience. We are particularly grateful to our copy-editor, Judith Oppenheimer, for her efficient and professional work on the manuscript, and to Dr Philip Hillyer for expertly compiling the index.
