

Acknowledgments

As a parent, I have always felt uncomfortable with the saying “it takes a village to raise a child.” As a historian, however, I have come to appreciate it. Though historians are typically regarded as solitary creatures, every project is a team effort, with numerous people playing key roles at key moments, each pushing our projects closer to completion.

First of all, I would like to thank all of our contributors. Without your commitment and hard work, this book would have never been possible. I would also like to thank Karen Marrero, Eric Schlereth, and Taylor Spence, who were all initially involved in this project, but for various reasons are not represented in this final draft. I would also like to thank Stephen Smith, Elsbeth Heaman, Marise Bachand, Yvan Lamonde, and Gavin Taylor for commenting on our chapters at our winter 2017 workshop at McGill.

I would also like to thank everyone at the McNeil Center for Early American Studies at the University of Pennsylvania. I spent two of the greatest years of my life at the McNeil Center, and in many ways, this book is the result of this time. In between our many Friday Seminars, numerous brown bags, frequent visits to New Deck, one haunted prison, and the odd game of “poor kitty,” I learned a lot about early America, which forced me to rethink Canada, North America, and the Rebellion. Sarah (G and R), Jess Linker, Christine, Brendan, American Max, Carolyn, Sonia, Lori, Rachel (Go Habs!), Alex F, Chris, Alex M, Tommy, Gabriel, Ala, and even you Jamie, thanks for making these years so memorable. James, Liz, Rachel, and Dan, thanks for being willing participants in our continuing texting shenanigans. I would also like to thank Dan Richter, my postdoctoral supervisor. What can I say about Dan that we don't already all know? If everyone in academia was like Dan, it would be a much better place. Barbara and Amy, thanks for allowing me to use the fax machine too frequently.

I would like to thank Dallett Hemphill. Before Dallett passed away, I proposed her this project as a special issue for Early American Studies. At that point, it was only an idea, an idea that Julien and I were still unsure of. Dallett's enthusiasm for this project gave us the confidence that we were onto something. If I have one minor regret about this project, it's the fact that we didn't publish with EAS as she hoped. As the project grew and became too big for a special issue, the move to MQUP was necessary.

I would also like to thank all of my friends at McMaster University and the Wilson Institute. Coming back to McMaster in 2016 in a non-academic position was a tricky transition. Thanks to Debbie, Wendy, and Aurelia, who helped and continue to help me navigate this new world, and Ian, for encouraging me to remain an academic, I was able to strike a nice balance between my academic and non-academic lives. To my fellow Wilson fellows – Asa, Phil, Amanda, Stacy, Jenn, Mary, and Kass – and to our Winstitute grad students – Jenna, Mack, Brandon, Carly, Kloiber, Chelsea, Mica, and Graydon – thanks for making our days together entertaining and enjoyable. Sam, thanks for editing my work, including those grammatically correct five-line sentences that you love so much. I owe you all my “Maxnowledgments.”

I'd also like to thank Julien. Julien and I have spent years, and incidentally too much money on coffee, discussing this project. Your espresso-fuelled creative energy was a joy to work with. Julien and I hope that this book will encourage historians of the Rebellion to look beyond the Canadian border, beyond the typical stories associated with the event, and push the Rebellion in new directions. For instance, though race plays a major role in this volume, the Rebellion's connection with Indigenous populations remains elusive.

Finally, I would like to thank Seve, Renton, and Tristan for listening to me rant about this project, the Rebellion, and Jacksonian America for four long years, which is incidentally also Tristan's entire life.

Maxime Dagenais

J'aimerais remercier en premier lieu deux personnes qui ont, pour différentes raisons, permis à ce livre de prendre son envol. Maxime, tout d'abord, qui, depuis Philadelphie, a lancé cette aventure collective. Son indéniable savoir-faire, sa maîtrise de la pratique de l'histoire, ainsi que son énergie, ont agréablement et efficacement rythmé les étapes menant au manuscrit final. Jason Opal, ensuite, qui a été le « troisième directeur » de ce livre. Jason a indéfectiblement soutenu le projet, il a largement contribué à la qualité du travail collectif, et ses conseils ont été extrêmement précieux.

J'ai souvent eu le sentiment, à tort ou à raison, que les événements de 1837 et des années subséquentes ne sont pas considérés comme ils le devraient – j'espère d'ailleurs que ce livre révélera aux lectrices et aux lecteurs l'étendue de notre méconnaissance du sujet et contribuera à démontrer son importance historique. C'est pourquoi je tiens à remercier celles et ceux qui ont manifesté leur intérêt pour ce projet ou qui y ont directement participé. Je remercie Ruth, Robert, Tommy, Andrew, Albert, Louis-Georges et Amy pour leur texte et leur participation active, ainsi que Karen Marerro, Eric Schlereth et Taylor Spence pour avoir pris part au projet à ses débuts. Je suis très reconnaissant envers Yvan Lamonde, Elsbeth Heaman, Marise Bachand, Gavin Taylor et Stephen Smith pour avoir pris de leur précieux temps pour nous aider à améliorer le manuscrit. Je remercie également Allan Greer, Martin Petitclerc, Jean-Philippe Garneau, Julie Guyot, Éric Bédard et celles et ceux que nous ne pouvons mentionner ici, dont les réflexions et les remarques ont contribué à façonner le livre. Je remercie Dan Richter pour nous avoir ouvert les portes du McNeil Center for Early American Studies à l'Université de Pennsylvanie, de même que Ian McKay et Sean Mills qui ont su nous convaincre de publier ce travail dans la collection Rethinking Canada in the World. Je suis également extrêmement reconnaissant envers l'Institut Wilson et le département d'histoire de l'Université McMaster pour leur soutien et leur confiance. Et je tiens tout particulièrement à évoquer ma gratitude envers les deux évaluateurs anonymes pour leur travail qui a pleinement contribué à l'amélioration du manuscrit.

Last but not least: Sophie, Lila, Jack, voilà quelques pages qui peuvent expliquer certains moments qui n'ont pas été passés ensemble. J'espère que vous les lirez un jour, c'est aussi votre histoire.
