

Acknowledgments

I wish to thank Jane Pavanel, the first editor of this manuscript, who taught me the importance of searching for names, dates, and facts, which through their absence would have diminished the readability of this story. She also taught me to avoid those convoluted and lengthy sentences a legal training is inclined to produce. Her editor's guillotine was lowered with diplomacy, allowing me to forgive her those brilliant phrases unceremoniously chopped in the interests of brevity and style.

After Jane completed her work, I expanded the Foreword and added another chapter, following which McGill-Queen's University Press submitted the entire text to Curtis Fahey, who skilfully edited and helped me revise the manuscript. I am most grateful for all his efforts. Many others at McGill-Queen's contributed their expertise to the project. Above all, I wish to thank Philip Cercone and Joan McGilvray, who encouraged me to complete the book and taught me a great deal about writing, publishing, and related issues during the process.

Rose-Marie Hozyan, my assistant of seventeen years, spent countless hours typing and retyping the text. Having been involved in many of the events described during the periods touched upon, she often recalled what I had forgotten and in so doing made the stories more complete. Her patience, cheerfulness, and support with this project, as with all others, have been greatly appreciated.

Many friends and colleagues generously took the time to review various chapters and make helpful suggestions. They include Claude Castonguay, John Ciaccia, Sam Elkas, Claude Forget, David Johnston, Fred Kaufman, Nicholas Kasirir, Peter Pamel, Jamie MacDougall, and Storrs McCall. My cousin Robert Paterson, who has been like a brother to me, provided a great deal of the information on our Paterson ancestors. Judy MacCallum, a cousin on my mother's side, gave me access to a collection of documents relating to the Irvines. I thank them all for their contributions.

I wish to thank my Swedish daughter-in-law, Eva Lott Bergstrom, who in December 2002 presented me with an inspiring Christmas gift – a leather-bound book for the purpose of recording my memoirs. At that same Christmas, another daughter-in-law, Heather, gave me the results of her research on the Irvine brothers. Without their interest and imagination, these memoirs might never have been started. My third daughter-in-law, Lynda, a librarian by profession, was a huge help in selecting and placing the pictures.

Finally, Brian Schneiderman, my partner at Borden Ladner Gervais, whose office was beside mine throughout the writing of this project, egged me on when I became frustrated. Without his enthusiastic encouragement, I might have thrown in the towel on several occasions.

Many thanks to you all and also, of course, to dear Joany, who withstood the repetitious outpouring of anecdotes she had heard many times before, and who added others whenever appropriate.
