

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This book is based on a number of separate pieces of research. Some of the work on the 1967 convention was undertaken as part of a joint project in which I was invited to participate by Professor Hugh Thorburn. Funding for that project was provided by the Canada Council and by the Donner Foundation. Some of the funding for the 1976 survey was provided by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation in preparation for its coverage of the convention. Support for other parts of the research was provided in the form of research assistance and computer grants by Queen's University.

Among the many people who have worked on this project I especially want to thank the students in my political parties seminar who conducted interviews at the 1976 convention, the friends who assisted me with interviews with members of Parliament in 1973 and 1974, and Peter Snow, who worked on the analysis of data from these two parts of the research.

Anyone familiar with the scholarship of John Meisel will recognize his influence on the interests and concerns of this book. Professor Meisel has been one of the few truly original students of Canadian politics, contributing as much by his insights as a teacher and critic as by the substantial body of his own published work. He, Ed Black, Jock Gunn, Jack Grove, and Hugh Thorburn have also given me the deeply valued support of their friendship and encouragement at times when it was most needed. These colleagues, Bill Irvine, and Peter Leslie have all read and made useful comments on portions of the manuscript.

My most notable debt is to Patti Peppin. In dedicating this book to her I have tried to express my gratitude both for the constancy of her support and for the unique contribution she made to the substance of the research in designing and carrying out the analysis of the 1967 delegate survey.

Several people have worked on the typescript for the book: Sheilagh Dunn, Jayne Hinchey, Gail Hogarth, Fanny Calucag, Dawn Snow, and Ann Young. While thanking them all, I particularly want to mention Mrs. Hinchey who was generous with her time in every emergency. I also wish to express my appreciation to Rene Hogarth, administrative officer of the Department of Political Studies at Queen's University, who has been responsible for the administration of various parts of the research.

As editor, Joan Harcourt has provided not just her technical skill, but also her morale-sustaining enthusiasm. In the final production of the manuscript I gratefully acknowledge both her contribution and that of Eleanor Gunn who prepared the index.

Finally, I owe a special debt to the many members of the Progressive Conservative party who co-operated in my research. In submitting to interviews and complying with requests to complete questionnaires, they have been notably generous with their time and patience. Whatever their opinions of my conclusions, I hope they will appreciate that the book is written not with the intention of criticizing their party, but with the intention of contributing to an understanding of its problems.
