

Acknowledgments

I HAVE MANY PEOPLE TO THANK for help with this project. Writing the book has been an exhilarating, at times frustrating, but ultimately rewarding journey. David Brady, Mo Fiorina, and Jon Krosnick deserve special thanks for their help in the early stages of this project. No one deserves more thanks (or blame) for making me stick with political science than David Brady. From our first discussions about Texas to our many discussions about this project, Brady has been uncommonly generous, not only with advice but also with Sunday afternoon time on his back porch, tickets to Stanford baseball games, and too many lunches and dinners to count. As a mentor, colleague, and friend, he has taught me an enormous amount about research, political science, and life. For that, I owe him an enormous intellectual and personal debt. Luckily we often have contradictory predictions about politics, and I trust I'll whittle away my debt through more wagers over the years. Serendipity put me into contact with Jon, and his work on issue publics eventually laid the foundation for this project. Laying this foundation, however, was no easy task. Jon kindly provided a lot of thoughtful advice, constructive critiques, and time. Mo Fiorina never failed to make incisive comments, modeling the precision and panache that characterize his writing and thinking. I hope to someday think as clearly as he does about the questions—and answers—in my research.

Many others helped shape the project into a book. Paul Sniderman has been amazing in helping me develop ideas for the book and navigate my way through the writing process. He was the first person to make the distinction between the personal and the political, and it took me two years to understand the wisdom of what he was saying. The acuity of his advice never surprises me, but I am repeatedly surprised by how generous someone as busy as Paul can be to a young scholar. Marshall Ganz has been a friend and mentor since college and has always challenged me to look beyond my computer to understand how politics works. He consistently helps me understand and articulate why these questions matter and what participation means in a democratic society. Dennis Chong read the manuscript at several different stages and provided crucial advice each time. His comments about participation among the underprivileged shaped the direction the manuscript ultimately took. Jamie Druckman's comments on several chapters helped me articulate the points I was making much more clearly. Taeku Lee took an interest in the project at a point when I was casting about for help and provided the intellectual direction, encouragement, and support that I needed.

The fifty-eight people who agreed to be interviewed for the Study of Political Pathways deserve special thanks. For confidentiality reasons, I cannot thank them explicitly here, nor can I list the many people and organizations who helped me recruit them. It was a fascinating experience to learn about each person's journey to political participation and inspiring to hear about the commitments these people made to participating in public life. I appreciated the willingness of each interviewee to engage in frank and open discussions and to be probed with sometimes personal and challenging questions.

At Wellesley College, Marjorie Schaeffer provided invaluable research assistance for the Study of Political Pathways. With intelligence, humor, and persistence, she recruited subjects, conducted interviews, and transcribed the audio files (twice!). Emily Sy and Catherine Chen both stepped in at clutch moments to help us finish work on short notice. Lindsay Miller provided able assistance with some literature reviews and data analysis. I am eager to see the great places all of these women will go. All of my colleagues in Wellesley's political science department have enriched my experience as a junior faculty member and given me support as I was finishing this project, especially those in American politics—Tom Burke, Marion Just, Wilbur Rich, and Nancy Scherer. The Knafel Assistant Professorship in the Social Sciences provided generous funding for the project.

In addition, Matthew Levendusky, Chaeyoon Lim, and an anonymous reviewer provided unusually helpful advice on the manuscript in its final stages. Matt and Chaeyoon, along with many other friends from graduate school, manage to make this work actually fun. There are many others whose contributions were invaluable, including Claudine Gay, Simon Jackman, Jeanette Lee-Oderman, Doug McAdam, and Eliana Vasquez. Kathryn Ciffolillo did an excellent job editing the manuscript. It was a pleasure working with Stacy Wagner and Jessica Walsh at Stanford University Press.

Finally, many friends and family inquired politely about my progress through the years and remained supportive even when my responses were muddled. Hilary Conklin and Peter Han get special kudos for reading my turgid academic prose and providing great feedback. As they have been many times in the past, Mom, Dad, Peter, Meredith, Steve, Carol, Hilary, and Scott were just the cheerleaders I needed at crucial times. Kaya was not even a gleam in our eyes when this project began, but now it is she who makes it all worthwhile. More than anyone, I thank Hunter. Who he is and what we share still stuns me every day. For all of that and much more, I dedicate the book to him.
