A VOLUME that has taken about a decade of research and reflections must have been written with the assistance and support, whether intellectual or practical, of many people—scholars, students, and colleagues in the Middle East, the United States, and Europe. Understandably, it is difficult to pinpoint them in order to record my sincere appreciation. But I do wish to register my deepest gratitude to them all. I am particularly grateful to Kaveh Ehsani and Zachary Lockman for their critical engagement with some of the key arguments in this book. Most of the pieces in this volume were produced or finalized during my work as the academic director of the Dutch-based International Institute for the Study of Islam in the Modern World (ISIM), a unique scholarly enterprise that combined rigorous scholarship with constructive social engagement. I am grateful to my colleagues at ISIM, especially staff members and the internationally diverse fellows who enriched the institute by their enthusiasm and their valuable and varied experiences. Some of the ideas in this book developed out of my short contributions to the ISIM Review, and some others from preparing numerous lectures, which I delivered in different parts of the world during the course of these years. I am grateful to the individuals and organizations who welcomed cooperation. Chapter 7, “Battlefield Tehran,” was prepared when I had just joined the Department of Sociology, University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign, where I have been blessed by a most supporting environment, kind and smart colleagues, and engaging graduate students. I completed Chapters 13 and 14, “The Post-Islamist Reolutions” and “The Green Revolt,” at Brown University’s Watson Institute for International Studies during the spring of 2012, as the inaugural Agha Khan

Visiting Professor of Islamic Humanities. I am most grateful for the opportunity and for the intellectual engagement with my colleagues at Watson Institute's Sociology Department, and beyond. Finally, I should mention that I have been working with Kate Wahl, my editor at Stanford University Press, for some years on a few projects, including this volume. I wish to record my deep appreciation of Kate's professionalism, commitment, and her uncommon perceptiveness regarding viable projects. As always, my greatest debt is to my family, Linda, Shiva, and Tara, whose unfailing love and support enabled these endeavors to materialize the way they have.
