

Acknowledgments

I would first and foremost like to thank Brian Schmidt for the extraordinarily valuable feedback and support he gave me throughout the research and drafting process of this book. I also thank Farhang Rajaei and Mira Sucharov, as well as Elinor Sloan and Brian Rathbun, for their advice.

I also express my deepest gratitude to all my superiors at the Department of National Defence with the Government of Canada, where I worked from 2003 until July 2014: Harky Smith, Claude Leblanc, Ben Lombardi, Vincent Rigby, James Groen, Michael Margolian, Martin Green, Col. Brian Irwin, Jean-François Morel, and Yves Goulet. Without their help, the inevitable but unfortunate bureaucratic resistance could very well have blocked my dream of pursuing a path combining academia and the civil service. In fact, to be able to have a foot in both the government and academic worlds for all those years was as gratifying an experience as it was fruitful. It is a balance I hope to pursue, in one form or another, in the coming decades.

I also want to thank all of my former colleagues, in Defence and elsewhere in the security and intelligence community, for innumerable arguments over the years on whether Iran is pursuing a nuclear bomb or whether the U.S. or Israel, or both, will attack Iran. These have been invaluable in helping me refine my views on Iran and its role and ambitions in the Middle East. It is partly thanks to those discussions that I steadily evolved toward the conclusion of this book—that Iran has broadly failed to achieve its foreign policy goals since 2001.

I particularly wish to thank Sam Razavi, a former colleague with whom I co-edited a book on Iran in 2013 (Iranian Foreign Policy since 2001: Alone in the World, 2013). The extensive work that went into preparing this book, as well as our many discussions around shawarma, have been essential in shaping my thinking on Iranian foreign policy.

Even though I joined the Graduate School of Public and International Affairs at the University of Ottawa only three weeks before submitting the final manuscript for this book, I strongly wish to thank the school for having welcomed me in its family. I especially want to thank Peter Jones for his invaluable advice and encouragement over the years. Never again will he pay for coffee in my company.

As I move on to my new career at the University of Ottawa, a special thought goes to professors Gérard Hervouet and Jean-Sébastien Rioux, whose advice and support during my masters studies at Laval University in Québec City—and ever since—have been invaluable.

At Stanford University Press, I wish to thank James Holt, editorial assistant, and Geoffrey Burn, executive editor (security studies, international relations, and politics), for their support, advice, and exemplary professionalism throughout the process of transforming the manuscript into a book. I also thank John Feneron, Martin Hanft, and Mary Mortensen for their help at various stages of the production process.

Finally, I wish to thank Marie-Hélène Chayer, my lovely wife, for her encouragement and patience (and exceptional editorial skills). As usual, the responsibility for any mistake or omission is mine.

T.J.

Squandered Opportunity

