

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

First and foremost, I thank the soldiers and families with whom I worked at Walter Reed. Not only did they allow—even encourage—me to be with them in a profoundly precarious moment, but they insisted on, and persisted in, the ordinariness of their lives. In doing this, often with a clarity and poetry that took me by surprise, they showed me how to pull at the thread of the extra/ordinary. I have done my best to work that thread with care and can only hope they recognize their extra/ordinary selves in this work.

Many thanks to the others at Walter Reed who eased my entry there and to everyone at LRMC who welcomed me to my first taste of the field and were so instrumental in getting me to my next one. I'm very grateful to Scott Ewing, Geoff Millard, Jose Vasquez, and other members of IVAW for their assistance and friendship during my time in D.C. Though the obstacles proved insurmountable, I do not take lightly the efforts of those who helped me at Ft. Dix, including Francis Booth, Chaplain Heisterman, and especially Denise Horton. And though they do not appear here, I thank the 9/11 first responders and survivors who shared their often painful stories with me.

My fieldwork was generously supported by a Dissertation Research Grant from the Wenner-Gren Foundation for Anthropological Research, and I have also received support from the Vonda McCrae Clarke Memorial / Ontario Graduate Scholarship in Anthropology, pilot research and numerous travel awards from the Department of Anthropology at the University of Toronto, and the Ethnographic Writing Fellowship at the Centre for Ethnography, University of Toronto Scarborough. The Department of Anthropology and broader community at the University of Toronto, where I completed my PhD, was an ever increasing font of intellectual energy. For their shared thoughts, unflagging support, and friendship over the years, I thank Joshua Barker, Naisargi Dave, Andrew Gilbert, the late Jennifer Jackson, Tania Li, Andrea Muehlebach, Gavin Smith, and the late Krys Sieciechowicz, as well as all the regular participants in the scl workshops with whom I have been lucky to participate in many ongoing conversations. I am especially grateful to Todd Sanders for his invaluable diligence and support, especially in the most uncertain moments, and to Michael Lambek for his insightful and incisive comments, terrific support and confidence, and ongoing council. Kori Allen, Lindsay Bell, Lauren Classen, Mieke deGelder, Sheri Gibbings, Sharon Kelly, Ashley Lebner, Natasha Pravaz, Alyson Stone, and Jessica Taylor have all been wonderful readers, advisors, and friends for the past decade or so. Loving thanks to my dear reader, friend, confidant, and companion in all things, Shaylih Muehlmann; to Janet McLaughlin, who makes me feel at home and think about the place of justice in it; and to the brilliant and unflappable Judy Taylor, who continually offers me wise counsel, good food, a warm bed, and reality checks.

In 2010 I was given the great gift of two months as the Ethel-Jane Westfeldt Bunting Summer Scholar fellowship at sar in Santa Fe. That time was invaluable, as was the strange magic of El Delerio, and the company, council, and (usually needed!) distraction of my friends there, especially James Brooks, Erin Debenport, Jason Pribilsky, Celia Ballì, Duane Slick, Nima Paidipady, and Siva Arumugam.

The completion of this manuscript would still be under way were it not for a NIMH-funded postdoctoral fellowship at the Institute of Health, Health Care Policy, and Aging Research at Rutgers University, which I held from 2011 to 2013. For that time I am indebted to the founding director, David Mechanic, and to Debby Carr, Peter Guarnacia, Beth Angel, and especially my supervisor, Allan Horwitz, for his faith and support. I also thank Peg Polansky for keeping the place running. I learned a great deal from the interdisciplinary conversations fostered at the Institute's weekly brown-bag talks, as well as from many conversations (and glasses of mescal) with all my fellow fellows, especially Eugenia Conde, Ken MacLeish, Shellae Versey, and Owen Wholey. At Rutgers I was lucky to participate in the Economies of Affect working group, which offered great conversations as well as invaluable comments on early portions of this manuscript, and to audit Ed Cohen’s core theory class. I do not remember how I thought before it, but I am certain it was not as well.

Over the years I have found myself participating in spaces, conversations, collaborations, and friendships of almost unimaginable intellectual richness and generosity. These have sustained and nourished me and sweetened my work and life in ways that continue to fend off the bitterness academic life so often brings. I will never know how to thank Ken MacLeish for being the very essence of all this in my life. I do know that my most well-crafted thoughts—especially any found in these pages—are honed in conversation with him. Other such intellectual treasures include the SCL workshop at the University of Toronto, SAR, and the Science Studies Ethnography workshop at New York University, a true treasure of a space run by the brilliant and gracious Rayna Rapp and Emily Martin. The workshop has been especially formative to my thinking about science, technology, and medicine over the past four years, and for that I am grateful to all the regular workshop participants. Julie Livingston, mensch among mortals, shows me how to navigate the world with serious humor, attention, and care and has helped me sort out many circular thoughts around conference tables and kitchen tables. And thanks to the companionship and occasional commiseration through the last years of this process from Alison Cool, Emily McDonald, Alison Howell, and Vanessa Agard-Jones, and also to Nick Dupree for helping me refuse the tyranny of independence.

I’m newly moved to think and write by many interlocutors in ongoing conversations about forms of life near death and besides hope, including Anne Allison, Angela Garcia, and Lisa Stevenson. I have tried to sow some seeds of our conversations into this book in the hope that they’ll grow future projects. I thank the indomitable Beth Povinelli, force of supernature, both for her work, which got me thinking along such tangled tracks, and for her terrific support, which has helped keep me going. I am triply indebted to Veena Das for her writing, which first showed me a way to think about violence and the ordinary, for her comments and questions as the external examiner of my dissertation, which were the starting point for making that text into this book, and for her continued support.

I have been shown uncountable kindnesses by many scholars working on issues related to war and militaries who have helped to shape my work. In particular, for their generous counsel and support, I thank Erin Finley, Lesley Gill, Hugh Gusterson, Matt Gutmann, Alison Howell, Beth Linker, Joe Masco, Seth Messinger, David Serlin, and Jennifer Terry. Tremendous thanks to Cathy Lutz for her support and her tireless work. Ken MacLeish and Erica Weiss both provided extremely astute comments on sections of this manuscript, which invigorated my thinking, as have the reflections of the members of the War and Global Health Working Group, organized by Omar al-Diwachi and the irrepressible Vinh-Kim Nguyen. My thinking about war and the lives and situations of those who wage it has further benefited from many encounters with others working on these same issues in the Costs of War Project at Brown University, the War and Intimacies Workshop at the University of Colorado, Boulder, and the Military Bodies workshop at the University of Michigan.

I am grateful to all my friends and colleagues at Columbia, who welcomed and supported me in many ways as I put the finishing touches on this manuscript. In particular, Nadia Abu al-Haj, Cassie Fennel, Steven Scott, and Brian Goldstone all offered invaluable comments on chapter drafts. Ellen Marakowitz and Beth Povinelli made it possible for me to take the necessary time to both live and work, which none of us can do without support. I am indebted to my editor at Duke University Press, Ken Wis-soker, for allowing this book to be what it is and for helping me to see it, and to both him and editorial associate Elizabeth Ault for their combined enthusiasm and patience, in perfect measure.

Heartfelt thanks to Viv Cornejo, Alec Milton, Rebecca Picherack, Alison Rapoport, and Elsa Silverman for their support, especially during my fieldwork. Deepest love and gratitude to my mother, Bridget Potter, for her beyond-the-beyondness; my father, Robert Wool; and my sister, Vanessa Potter Wool. Love and thanks also to Hyacinth Campbell, Barbara and Barry Siskind, Sy Silverberg and Cat Uhlin, Mark Silverberg and Lynda Ceresne, Emma Kleiman, Bob Silverberg and Carol Loffelmann, and Aidyn, Zoë, Daniel, and Colin.

Ultimately I am grateful to and for Cory Silverberg, who has been abidingly present—before, during, after, and aside from my fieldwork and writing—instigating all manner of queer comforts in our lives, filling our bookshelves with sexuality, disability, and children’s literature, and allowing us to be undone by each other. That we now get to fill all the little crannies of our souls and worlds with Sadie and share her with so many amazing people is an indescribable privilege and joy.

The best of this book came about only with this abundance of support. The errors and shortcomings remain mine alone.
