“Loneliness is such a drag,” Jimi Hendrix once pronounced. And writing, a solitary pursuit, can be a lonely enterprise. Mercifully, friends and colleagues have been with me through the long process of bringing this book on black rock to closure, preventing me from feeling too lonely, lonely, lonely. I was fortunate to start this project at New York University in an environment where mixing anthropology, media, and research in the United States seemed to make sense. Kamau Brathwaite, Donna Buchanan, Manthia Diawara, Barry Dornfeld, Steven Gregory, Fred Myers, Tricia Rose, Andrew Ross, Bambi Schieffelin, and Connie Sutton introduced me to a broad range of perspectives and have been superb intellectual and professional mentors. I owe a very special thanks to Faye Ginsburg who was, from the very beginning, an engaged and demanding advisor whose commitment to taking art and activism seriously has been both formative and inspirational. Deborah Elliston, Amy Empson, Brian Larkin, Meg McLagan, Robert Moise, Tony Rossi, Lotti Silber, Marilyn Thomas-Houston, Deborah Thomas, and Erica Wortham gave me excellent moral(e) support at NYU. I thank Patsy Asch who graciously provided my housing during my fieldwork in Los Angeles and Steve Feld for his encouragement along the way.

My colleagues at Wesleyan University and UCLA have provided stimulating environments and community. I especially want to thank Karen Brodtkin, Carole Browner, Mickey Davidson, Ann duCille, Susan Hirsch, Jay Hoggard, Jeff Kerr-Ritchie, Cheryl Keyes, Liza McAlister, Claudia Mitchell-Kernan, Harryette Mullen, Sarah Ohly, Gayle Pemberton, Renée Romano, Ashraf Rushdy, Kate Rushin, Mark Slobin, Valerie Smith, Besty Traube, and Jennifer Tucker for their camaraderie. Sandro Duranti and Richard Yarborough have been especially energetic supporters of my research and fun to hang out with; they also have shared their ideas about music and politics and helped me work through my own. Thanks to Renée Romano and Laura Helper who read and commented on various drafts. I'm especially grateful to my colleague Allen Johnson for his incisive reading of the manuscript and his valuable suggestions at a critical moment. Thanks also to Antero Garcia, a UCLA undergraduate, for his assistance with the discography.

The staff at Duke University Press made putting the book together a pleasurable experience. It has been enormously fun to work with Ken Wissoker, who approached this project with a buoying mix of from-the-heart enthusiasm and firm editorial guidance. Two anonymous readers gave the text a thorough and thoughtful review and their comments led to significant improvements.

Lee Baker has been a dear friend with an unlimited supply of positive energy. Patrick Dodd brought glorious couleurs. Chris Pfaff got things started by giving me clippings on the BRC, digging up the names and phone numbers I needed to get connected, and insisting that the whole project was a good idea. Ned Anthony provided companionship, intellectual challenges, and got me closer to appreciating Led Zeppelin than I ever thought possible. With their expertly timed phone calls and witty e-mail messages, Daphne Brooks and Judith Casselberry pulled me through the last stages of writing with my sense of humor and my spirit intact. They have been way more than generous with their warmth, insight, and ability to make me laugh. I value their friendship. Also, of course, thanks, Mom.

My greatest debt is to the members of the Black Rock Coalition in New York and Los Angeles. They welcomed me into their communities and made it possible for me to “do anthropology” on their organization. I am grateful for their interest in my project and for their willingness to help me every step of the way by providing phone numbers, newspaper articles, photographs, and above all their music and stories. Earl Douglas, Don Eversley, Rob Fields, Beverly Jenkins, Bruce Mack, Konda Mason, Beverly Milner, Jimmy Saal, and Greg Tate made important contributions to the research and smoothed the way considerably. A heartfelt thank-you to Bill Toles for his help in the field, for reading and commenting on early drafts, and for many great conversations about music and just about everything else. Vernon Reid has my lasting gratitude for believing in the project and for supplying healthy doses of his irrepressible wit. Pictures may well be worth thousands of words and I thank Andrea Clarke, Don Eversley, David Fiuczynski, Michael Hill, Bruce Mack, Tracie Morris, Tori Ruffin, Jimmy Saal, and Bill Toles for helping me locate photographers and for generously sharing their personal BRC archives. Mia Friday deserves special recognition for saving boxes of materials from the early days of the BRC and Living Colour and for taking the time to sift through them with me on an autumn Sunday afternoon. I am deeply grateful to Lian Amber, Drew Carolan, Janine da Silva, Giselle May, and Lamar Thompson for going to a lot of trouble at the last minute to supply me with photographs and for allowing me to reproduce their excellent work here.

Parts of the text of chapter 2 appeared in American Ethnologist, 27 (2): 283–311. Funding from the National Science Foundation Pre-Doctoral Fellowship for Minorities, a Small Grant from the Wenner-Gren Foundation for Anthropological Research, and a Ford Foundation Dissertation Fellowship made it possible to do the research and get the ideas onto the page. Funding of another sort came from my parents, to whom I dedicate this book. Their cautious belief in the civil rights dream and their understanding of how to deal with its realities helped me make it this far and, on an even more practical note, they were the first people to play records for me.
