

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Many people have helped us realize this collection and we are grateful to all of them. First, we want to thank the contributors, most of whom we have been in direct communication with, for their exhilarating and innovative scholarship. It goes without saying that their work is the sine qua non of our project to reimagine both colonial and world histories. We have also been aided along the way by invaluable critical feedback from Amanda Brian, Barbara Brookes, Clare Crowston, Ian Fletcher, Yael Simpson Fletcher, Durba Ghosh, Brian Mouloughney, Fiona Paisley, Adele Perry, Mrinalini Sinha, Heather Streets, and Margaret Strobel. Anu Rao's counsel has been especially invaluable. Joan Catapano offered some crucial bibliographical information as well as her ongoing support for the project of women's and gender history. Students in Jean Allman and Antoinette Burton's graduate seminar, "Gender and Colonialism," in spring 2003 at the University of Illinois helped to test the efficacy of our arguments by discussing a number of the essays that have made their way into the collection. We are especially grateful to Erica Fraser, Keguro Macharia, and James Warren for their astute readings.

Our engagements with world history in recent years have, for better or worse, been shaped by discourses of globalization. One formative experience we shared was in a 2001–2002 NEH-funded seminar in the History Department at Illinois, entitled "Transforming the Undergraduate History Core in a Global Age" and co-organized with Peter Fritzsche. Much of what this book is about stems from conversations with our colleagues here and elsewhere, and we appreciate their role in shaping what it has become. Miriam Angress at Duke University Press has been a constant source of good advice, goodwill, and good humor, for which we are grateful. Not least, we have relied on the labor of James Beattie, Ciara Breathnach, Jason Hansen, and Deborah Hughes for the photocopying and scanning of the essays, and we thank them. Without Paul Arroyo's technical assistance (and so much more), this book would not have been possible. In addition to preparing the index, Sally Henderson provided great advice and support (as ever!).

Bodies in Contact is dedicated to the youngest among us. May they grow up to encounter each other and change the world.
