

Acknowledgments

I believe that any intellectual project is by nature collective, in the sense that it owes much to support, conversations, and readings, only some of which one can remember. To all of them, those I recall and those I do not, I thank.

I have traveled with this project for many years. On the way, several institutions have generously supported my work. In Argentina, these include the Universidad de Buenos Aires and the Consejo Nacional de Investigaciones Científicas y Técnicas. In Spain, these include the Escuela de Estudios Hispano-Americanos, Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas, and the Fundación Sánchez-Albornoz. In the United States, these include the following: the Duke University–University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill, Program in Latin American and Caribbean Studies, with successive funding from the Mellon, Tinker, and Ford Foundations; at Duke University, the Department of Cultural Anthropology, the Graduate School, the Center for International Studies, and the John Hope Franklin Institute for the Humanities; and at Indiana University, the Mendel Committee, Lilly Library. This sustained support resulted in several articles, some of which are part of this book. Chapter 1, with some minor changes, has appeared in Comparative Studies in Society and History 47, no. 1 (2005). An earlier version of chapter 5 has appeared in Colonial Latin American Review 10, no. 1 (2001), under the title: “Definir y dominar: Los lugares grises en el Cuzco hacia 1540.” I thank both journals for allowing me to reproduce these articles. I also want to thank Martti Pärssinen for granting me permission to use as the basis for map number 1 the map that appears on page 74 of Tawantinsuyu (which is, in turn, based on John Rowe's 1946 map). I am also grateful to the many archives whose personnel have helped me find my way around messy piles of dusty papers. In Peru, these were the Archivo Regional del Cuzco, the Archivo Histórico Nacional, and the Biblioteca Nacional; in Spain, the Archivo General de Indias, the Archivo Histórico Nacional, the Biblioteca Nacional, the Archivo General de Simancas, the Real Academia de la Historia, and the Abadía del Sacro Monte; in Argentina, the Archivo General de la Nación; and in the United States, the Piermont-Morgan library and the Lilly Library, at Indiana University.

I am indebted to many people in Peru, for different reasons. Miguel Glave and Hénrique Urbano helped me take my first steps in Peruvian archives many years ago. Later on, Franklin Pease G. Y. and Teodoro Hampe Martínez also supported my research. During my repeated visits, my friends Verónica Trelles Throne, Silvia Arispe, Miguel Baca and Paloma Visscher introduced me to many respectable venues in Lima, including the Santa Sede and the Kitsch. Donato Amado's erudition guided me through out-of-place archival files and helped me to make sense of sixteenth-century Cuzco places' and people's names. Sonia Velazco Flores was my "alma mater" in Cuzco; she took good care of my human shape when I was exhausted and half frozen after too much archival work in the winter; her compadre and comadre took good care that I was not too sober.

In Argentina, many on the Ethnohistory Team of the Anthropology Department and in the Program of Latin American History at the Universidad de Buenos Aires helped me persevere until I became a licenciado. Roxana Boixadós and Marta Madero were very appreciated sources of energy and intellectual stimulation as I made my years as an investigador becario. During those same years, and later as I took my first steps in the United States, I was lucky to have the constant support, intellectual companionship, and friendship of Enrique Tandeter. Unfortunately he could not see the outcome of it all; I send him and his wife, Dora, my deepest gratitude in memoriam. In Spain, Gema Puchal and Braulio Flores opened their house to me; although they meant to make me feel at home, their tortillas—the most fabulous on earth—were too discrepant. Carmen Gómez helped me find my way at the Hispalense, where, as my research led me to interrogate issues of legal history, I discussed ideas and received guidance from Fernando Muro Romero. In Germany Horst Pietschmann also helped me walk this difficult terrain.

In my years in the United States, many people helped me develop my ideas and turn them into a text. The department of Cultural Anthropology at Duke University was an ideal place to write the dissertation on which this book is based. In particular, I became indebted, scholarly and otherwise, to Charles Piot, Orin Starn, Walter Mignolo, William Reddy, and Irene Silverblatt. Tomas Rogers and Ivonne Wallace-Fuentes, on the other hand, proved to be indefatigable colleagues and friends. Throughout the years, Catherine Julien has repeatedly helped me with erudite answers. The end of this long, serendipitous trajectory took place in the department of Hispanic Languages and Literatures at the University of Pittsburgh. Here, conversations with Elizabeth Monasterios, John Beverly, and Hermann Herlinghaus, and discussions with graduate students in the seminars I taught in the last three years, helped me further put my writing into perspective and elaborate still inchoate ideas. The critiques and suggestions of the anonymous reviewers at Duke University press, finally, pushed me to make the manuscript more coherent. All mistakes, needless to say, are mine.

Of course, without my family and close friends none of this would have ever been written. They know well enough who they are and how much they mean to me. Gracias a todas/os; köszönöm.
