

Acknowledgments

This book would not have been written without the constant support of teachers, family, and friends, and I am pleased to have the opportunity to thank them all. I would like first to thank Professor Theofanis G. Stavrou and Kim Munholland, Sarah Chambers, Gary Jahn, and Ronald Walter for all their feedback on the manuscript and their support during the research and writing process. Professor Stavrou played a central role from the moment I expressed interest in working with him until I completed this project. Most important, it was he who encouraged me to examine the role of the Church of Greece during the Axis occupation. Soterios Stavrou also deserves special thanks for his help and support. His method of teaching and his patience helped me appreciate the fascinating nuances of the modern Greek language. He has carefully read various drafts of the manuscript and spent hours with me going over translations of Greek sources that served as the backbone of this study. I consider myself fortunate to call him a friend and mentor.

Special thanks also goes to Professor Jonathan Grant. Ever since I was an undergraduate at Florida State University, he has been a constant source of invaluable advice and support. It was he who informed Professor Kurt Piehler, editor of Fordham University Press's World War II series, about my work. After Fordham showed interest in the project, he has played a significant role in helping transform this study into a book. In addition to carefully reading several versions of the manuscript, he has offered critical advice on ways to make the work appeal to a broader audience.

While researching this project, I was fortunate to enjoy the friendship and assistance of a number of individuals in Greece. First and foremost, I want to thank Professor Efthymios Soulogiannis, who proved to be my right-hand person, and indeed acted as an unofficial adviser. Specifically, he helped me gain access to archives and took time to meet and discuss my project with me on numerous occasions. He also helped me adjust to the pace of Athenian life. I also want to express my appreciation to the staff at the Academy of Athens, the Archive of the Holy Synod, the Historical Archive of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, the Hellenic Literary and Historical Archive, the Library of the Parliament, the National Library of Greece, the Gennadius Library, and the Library of the Holy Synod.

I would not have been able to conduct the research for this project without the grants and fellowships provided by the University of Minnesota, Twin Cities: I received two FLAS fellowships from the European Studies Consortium, two Basil Laourdas fellowships, and an International Thesis Research Grant from the Graduate School.

I would also like to thank Fordham University Press for their constant help and support throughout this process. Professor Kurt Piehler, who showed the initial interest in my work, has offered insightful feedback about the manuscript. He has been infinitely patient in answering my many questions and has been a constant source of encouragement. I also want to thank Fred Nachbaur, Will Cerbone, and Katie Sweeney for their assistance. Last but not least, I would like to thank the reviewers for their immensely helpful feedback.

I also want to thank my friends for all their support over the years. Christopher Rene, Thomas Farmer, Angelo Georgakis, Erich Lippman, Çiğdem Çıdam, Gergo Baics, Denis Vovchenko, Daniel Ortiz, and Ed Sheehy deserve special mention.

Finally, I would like to thank my family for all their support over the years. During my numerous trips to Greece, family and friends opened their home and offered warm hospitality. Uncle Vassili and Aunt Sofia encouraged me to stay with them in Crete whenever I had a chance. In fact, their house became a second home to me. Aunt Maria, Uncle Nikos, and Cousin Aris provided a wonderful family atmosphere during my Sunday visits. Most important, I would like to thank my parents, Helen and George Anastasakis, and my brother, Nick, for their endless love and support.

No person has been more critical to the completion of this project than my partner, Ayten Gündoğdu. From the beginning, she has been a constant source of support and encouragement. She has spent countless hours helping me with the project, from the early stages when I was formulating my research questions, applying for funding, and conducting my research, to the last stage when I submitted the final draft of the book manuscript. Having her, and our dear ones, Panos and Charlie, in my life reminds me how fortunate I am every day.
