

Acknowledgments

First, I would like to thank Bill Lawson for convincing me in a conversation we had during the 2007 Philosophical Collaborations conference at Southern Illinois University Carbondale that I should be comfortable stating the thesis of this book as I initially envisioned it: This book is an effort to interpret Gabriel Marcel's reflective method in terms of Lewis R. Gordon's notion of the teleological suspension of philosophy. Lawson also reminded me that stating the thesis of my book in this way could be considered a political act in the sense that it is still relatively rare that a European or Euro-American philosopher's thought is interpreted in terms of an African philosopher.

I also would like to thank Randy Auxier, Ken Stickers, Lenore Langsdorf, Anthony J. Steinbock, and Stephen Tyman who helped and inspired me to transform my ideas into a book I think is worthwhile. I especially thank my mentor and friend, Randy Auxier, for allowing me to write on the philosophical issues that I care about personally and for teaching me how to philosophize honestly during my graduate studies. For better and for worse I have learned more about being a philosopher from him than anyone else. I also would like to thank Lewis R. Gordon for his support for this book and his prompt answers to any questions I had about his philosophy of religion. His answers further substantiated my contention that his philosophy of religion is compatible with Gabriel Marcel's religious existentialism.

In addition, I would like to express my heartfelt gratitude to Bruce Buchanan, Dwight Welch, Tommie Curry, Tanya Jeffcoat, and Jason Hills. I especially would like to thank Tommie for teaching me the basics of critical race theory (CRT) and how CRT in legal studies differs from how most contemporary academic philosophers of race conceive of CRT.

Furthermore, I would like to thank my colleagues in the Philosophy Department at Grand Valley State University—especially Coeli Fitzpatrick, Maria Cimitile, Kelly Parker, Eric Chelstrom, Stephen Rowe, and Andrew Spear—for providing me with a supportive environment as I edited and revised this manuscript. I would be remiss if I neglected to thank Helen Tartar, Thomas Lay, and my copy editor, Michael Koch. Their advice has made this book much better than it would have been otherwise.

I thank DePaul University for permission to reprint in chapter 3 excerpts from my article “Struggling against the Specter of Dehumanization: The Experiential Origins of Marcel’s Reflective Method,” published in Philosophy Today 53, no. 2 (Summer 2009): 147–60. I also thank the Ohio Valley Philosophical Association for permission to reprint in chapters 4 and 5 excerpts from my article “Taking Africana Philosophy of Education Seriously,” published in Philosophical Studies in Education 39 (2008): 46–55. Moreover, I thank the Caribbean Philosophical Association for permission to reprint in the introduction and in chapter 2 excerpts from my article “Learning Metaphysical Humility with Lewis Gordon’s Teleological Suspension of Philosophy,” published in CLR James Journal: A Publication of the Caribbean Philosophical Association 14, no. 1 (Spring 2008): 157–68.

Of course, I thank my family, first and foremost, for tolerating and loving me even when I sometimes acted in a less-than-lovable manner as I wrote, revised, and edited this book. They have collectively paid a debt that I can never repay.

DOING PHILOSOPHY PERSONALLY
