

Acknowledgments

In writing this book I have accumulated many intellectual debts and I have benefited from the broad-mindedness, generosity, and friendship of many people. It is with great pleasure that I acknowledge these debts here and thank these generous friends and colleagues. I am particularly grateful to Giuseppe Mazzotta for the friendship, generosity, and constant encouragement he has shown me over many years. His work and vision, fundamental optimism, and solar personality have inspired me and taught me what it means to be, in a meaningful way, a humanist scholar in the twenty-first century. I am very grateful to Branka Arsić for the instrumental role she played in bringing this project to life. Apart from being the most interesting Berkeley scholar I know, Branka is always a caring and understanding friend. I am grateful to Peter Harrison for reading the whole manuscript and providing me with priceless feedback. This book was born out of a doctoral dissertation. I take great delight in thanking David Cooper for guiding me, with unique kindness, patience, and grace, through my doctoral studies at the University of Durham, in England. Special thanks go Andrew Louth and Stephen Clark, members of my dissertation committee, for their important comments, recommendations, and advice. Thanks to the generosity of all these people this book is improved. Needless to say, I am the only one responsible for its shortcomings and weak points.

I finished writing this book while holding postdoctoral positions at two U.S. universities. I am grateful to Jonathan Monroe, director of Cornell University's Knight Institute for Writing, and to Karen Dawisha, director of Miami University's Havighurst Center for Russian and Post-Soviet Studies, for their institutional support and their personal friendship. Helen Tartar, of Fordham University Press, has played an essential role in the publication of this book. I am very grateful to her. Nicholas Frankovich and Dorothea Halliday took very good care of the book's editing, for which they have my deepest gratitude.

I also own special thanks to some good friends who in many important ways and on various occasions have helped me over the last few years: Sorin Antohi, Aurelian Craiutu, and Stephen Thornton.

Above all, I am grateful to my wife for things that are so numerous and so important that they cannot be listed here.

Earlier versions of some of the materials in this book have been published before in journals or collected volumes. I am grateful to the following editors and publishers for allowing me to reproduce these materials: Stephen Thornton, editor of the electronic journal Minerva, for “Berkeley and Liber Mundi,” published in Minerva—An Internet Journal of Philosophy 3 (November 1999); the Society for the Utopian Studies for “Waiting for the Eschaton: Berkeley’s ‘Bermuda Project’ between Earthly Paradise and Educational Utopia,” published in the Journal of Utopian Studies 14:1 (spring 2003); Palgrave Macmillan for “‘One is All, and All is One’: The Great Chain of Being in Berkeley’s Siris,” published in Ordering the World in the Eighteenth Century, ed. Frank O’Gorman and Diana Donald, Studies in Modern History Series, 2005; Instituti Editoriali e Poligrafici Internazionali (Pisa, Italy) for “Alchemists or Ecologists? Some Remarks on the Philosophy of Alchemical Transmutation,” published in Acta Philosophica: Rivista Internazionale di Filosofia 14: 2 (2005); the Peeters Publishers for “George Berkeley’s ‘Universal Language of Nature,’” published in The Book of Nature in Early Modern and Modern History, ed. Klaas van Berkel and Arjo Vanderjagt (Leuven, Belgium: Peeters Publishers, 2006); and Blackwell Publishing for “Rhetoric of Faith and Patterns of Persuasion in Berkeley’s Alciphron,” published in the Heythrop Journal 47:4 (October 2006).

While a doctoral student at Durham, where this book was actually begun, I benefited from the financial support of several institutions and foundations, for which I am very grateful: the University of Durham, the University of Durham’s Department of Philosophy, the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals of the Universities of the United Kingdom, the Open Society Institute in New York, and the Ratiu Family Charitable Foundation.
