

Acknowledgments

It is easy during the long, often secluded hours of writing and research to forget the uncountable instances of intellectual, material, financial, and spiritual aid that have made a project like this one possible. The small ritual of writing acknowledgments reminds us that, whatever we do, we are never alone.

My interest in the rather improbable topic of poetry recitation came about while I was doing graduate research based at Beijing University in 1995–1996 funded by the Committee for Scholarly Communications with China. During that time abroad, Professor Qian Liqun of the Peking University Department of Chinese generously gave of his time and energy, all the while serving as a model of serious commitment to the modern Chinese intellectual legacy he has inherited. I also thank my friends on the staff of the National Library of China, formerly known as the National Beijing Library, and comrades Zhou and Wu in particular, for making the time-consuming task of gathering and copying my materials both congenial and expeditious.

For intellectual support on a project that has changed shape and shed its skin more times than I can remember, a debt of gratitude extends to Prasenjit Duara for helping me keep an eye on the bigger picture, to Paul Friedrich for reminding me that poetry is less something we read than something we already are, to Gregory B. Lee for guidance from near and afar in the construction of this humble hacienda, and to William Sibley for stepping up to the plate when it really counted. A word of thanks also goes to Margot Browning and the folks at the University of Chicago Franke Institute of the Humanities for providing me with a very quiet place to think and write during the 1999–2000 academic year, and to Jason McGrath and Xiaobing Tang for making me a part of the productively cacophonous “China’s Long Twentieth-Century Workshop.”

A Fulbright Program China Studies Research Award in 2005–2006 made possible my own immersion in the world of poetry and poetry recitation in and beyond Beijing. Alongside that support was, of course, the generous assistance of colleagues at Colgate University, including not just the careful counseling of the Grants Office, but also the continuing advice and mentorship of Gloria Bien, who made my position at Colgate possible through a start-up grant from the Henry R. Luce

Fund for Asian Studies. I also thank the Colgate Research Council for a publication subsidy.

Among the many friends and associates who have contributed to this project are Maghiel van Crevel, Graham Hodges, Yu Jian, Zang Di, Sun Wenbo, Wang Jiaxin, Jiang Tao, Bei Ta, Xie Mian, Wang Benchao, Cao Can, Zhu Lin, Yin Zhiguang, George O'Connell, Hei Dachun, Sun Jigang, Yu Zhenzhi, and the members of the Capital Friends of Recitation club, especially Xu Lianyong, Wang Aiping, and Ji Guosheng. Special thanks go as well to Matthew Forney and Paola Zuin for making my every return to Beijing a welcome one.

Chapter 6 was published in an earlier version but with the same title in Modern Chinese Literature and Culture 13, no. 2 (2001). Chapter 7 appeared previously in a Chinese-language version in New Poetry Review (Xinshi pinglun) with the title "Cong 'yundong' dao 'huodong': Shi langsong zai dangqian Zhongguo de jiazhi" (From yundong to huodong: The value of poetry recitation in today's China), trans. Wu Hongyi, no. 6 (November 2007). I thank both publications for permission to reprint these materials.

Most of all, I thank my parents for their unflagging, loving encouragement; Henry and Emma for creating a positive imbalance between work time and play time; and Botao for holding up half my sky, and then some.
