

Acknowledgments

From the beginning of my research on Kyoto, Takahashi Yasuo has been a wise and generous mentor. While under his supervision during two extended periods of research at Kyoto University, I also benefited from the guidance and friendship of Yamagishi Tsuneto, Tomishima Yoshiyuki, Kishi Yasuko, and Toya Nobuhiro. At Princeton University, Martin Collcutt and David Howell were outstanding advisors, perfectly blending strong academic training with personal warmth and support. Thomas Hare and Jacqueline Stone inspired my research and Yasuko Makino provided practical assistance with library materials. As reliable sources of counsel and good humor, my peers in the Vicus Lusorum that was Princeton's graduate program also deserve recognition. They include Reggie Jackson, Stacy Nakamura, Eric Dinmore, Hans Bjarne Thomsen, Sakurako Handa, Micah Auerbach, Alexander Vesey, Aaron Moore, Robert Cross, Jonathan Abel, Xiaojin Wu, Young-Ah Chung, Mark Rowe, Lori Meeks, and Rick Berger. I will always feel a special sense of fraternity toward Morgan Pitelka. He first nudged me onto my current path while we were living, quite coincidentally, as neighbors in Kyoto in 1998. I am grateful he did.

Several extended periods of research at the University of Tokyo's Historiographical Institute were facilitated by Ishigami Eiichi and Takahashi Shin'ichirō. Professor Takahashi continues to be a source of tremendous guidance and friendship. Haruko Wakabayashi welcomed me to the Institute's Japan Memory Project and arranged for my ongoing access to the archives. In Tokyo, I also benefited from regular contact with Itō Takeshi and Yoshida Nobuyuki. Ellen Van Goethem generously hosted me at Hōsei University and was an outstanding source of advice and support.

The manuscript for this book was finalized at Kyoto University during a visiting professorship arranged by Nakajima Setsuko. I feel a profound sense of gratitude to Professor Nakajima and her colleagues, Iyori Tsutomu and Noboru Ogata.

At the University of Sydney, I am surrounded by admirable colleagues who support my work and help keep me sane. For their institutional leadership and good counsel, Elise Tipton and Olivier Ansart are foremost among them. Adrian Vickers and Robert Aldrich are inspirational for their balance of scholarly achievement and humanity. It is a special pleasure to work side by side with Michael Lewis at Sydney. It was he who, at Michigan State University many years ago, first introduced me to the professional study of history. His influence on my career has been long-standing, diverse, and always positive.

There are several people who deserve recognition for their constant—albeit often virtual—presence as mentors and friends. They include Suzanne Gay, Yukio Lippit, Kawamoto Shigeo, Thomas Conlan, Yoshimura Takahiko, Royall Tyler, Michael Watson, Mikael Bauer, and Brian Ruppert. Kuniko McVey of the Harvard-Yenching Library generously found, scanned, and sent to me a large number of sources. Stephen Parker provided invaluable advice on the final manuscript that both refined and clarified.

I am indebted to many institutions that facilitated and funded my research over the years. Although they are mentioned only in passing here, I would like express my most sincere sentiment that the work of each is critical to the continued advancement of knowledge. This book is only one modest result. The Japanese Ministry of Education (Monbushō) funded two long stays in Japan, first at Hiroshima University (1995–1996) and then at Kyoto University (1998–2000). The Graduate School at Princeton University fully endowed my five years of doctoral study, including summers in Japan. A dissertation fellowship from J. William Fulbright-IIIE, which was underwritten by the Mitsubishi Kinyōkai, allowed me to conduct another year of research at Kyoto University in 2002. A sabbatical spent at the University of Tokyo in 2009 was made possible by the Japan Foundation, which, mainly through its office in Sydney, has supported my work in countless other ways as well. Koike Wakao and Tokuman Sayuri have made sure of that, and to them both I am deeply grateful. The University of Sydney's Faculty of Arts and Social Sciences gave me several grants for materials and travel, as did the School of Languages and Culture and the Department of Japanese Studies. The latter also supplied a generous publishing subsidy for this book. Additional publishing support was received from the Australian Academy of the Humanities and the Japan Foundation.

I am grateful to the several institutions that provided images and image permissions for this book. They are acknowledged individually in the captions. At the Kyoto City Library of Historical Documents, Matsunaka Hiroshi graciously gave me access to illustrations, maps, and a stunning 1/1000 model of Heian-kyō. The Kyoto Prefectural Archives in Kitayama deserves special mention. It is one of the best libraries I have used, staffed by professionals who facilitated my research in many ways. Yoriko Igari and Umatani Osamu provided illustrations for this book and advice on presenting visual materials.

My impulse to thank the editor is by no means a mere courtesy. I have found Patricia Crosby's near legendary status in the field well deserved. For her extraordinary professionalism and grace, I record here my most sincere thanks. Managing editor Ann Ludeman was equally as helpful, and Drew Bryan was an excellent copy editor. David Kelly stepped in at the last minute to assist with key editorial decisions.

This book is dedicated to Kyoko, my wife and companion throughout. Quality time spent with her and our children, Miyako and Kent, kept me from finishing this book sooner, and I would never have had it any other way.

Matthew Stavros
CAMPERDOWN

