For me, writing a book has been a long, arduous, and challenging process that has been sustained only through the support and encouragement of mentors, colleagues, friends, and family. The germination of this book project occurred at the University of Chicago, where my faculty advisers helped me every step of the way on how to become a passionate and imaginative historian. I cannot thank Bruce Cumings enough for being such a compassionate mentor who taught me to study history with conviction and as a means to solve serious problems in the present world. Since the time he supervised my undergraduate thesis at Northwestern University, his scholarship has been a continuous source of intellectual inspiration. Above all, his friendship has helped me negotiate the complex world of academia and face any issues with confidence. I also especially want to thank Tetsuo Najita and James Ketelaar for teaching me the value of intellectual history and the power of ideas to cause social change. I am grateful to William H. Sewell Jr. for introducing me to critical theory and explaining difficult concepts in simple ways.

My cohorts at the University of Chicago have been an invaluable source of support, the best sounding board to test ideas, and the push behind my intellectual growth. Kornel Chang, Chong-Myong Im, and Mikael Wolfe have been warm sources of encouragement who helped me make sense of my rambling ideas. Michael Shin's intellectual rigor and work ethic have been valuable models for my own scholarship, and I am extremely grateful to him for supporting my academic career from its earliest stages. Suzy Kim deserves special thanks because she has been a caring friend who not only has given invaluable comments on almost all my work in the midst of her busy life but has also continuously encouraged me to think boldly. Namhee Lee's advice and help have made me into a better thinker and enhanced my scholarship, while Charles Armstrong, Robert Oppenheimer, and Theodore Jun Yoo have been tremendous in providing valuable advice and resources.

I am fortunate to have supportive colleagues at the Claremont Colleges. Angelina Chin, Arash Khazeni, and Samuel Yamashita at Pomona College have always helped me refine my ideas through reading groups and discussions over coffee and meals. Gaston Espinoza (Claremont McKenna College) helped me articulate the key points of my study and generously came up with the title of this book. The Department of History at Claremont McKenna College is a collection of outstanding and caring scholars and teachers. I especially want to thank Gary Hamburg, Nita Kumar, Arthur Rosenbaum, and Diana Selig for reading parts of my book manuscript and Jonathan Petropoulos for his wise counsel as I searched for a publisher for this book. David K. Yoo, who was my department mentor at Claremont McKenna and is now the director of Asian-American Studies at UCLA, has been an outstanding role model and friend. I am extremely fortunate to have learned from him how to stay steady and optimistic as an academic.

This book benefited tremendously from the insights and advice of various scholars. John Duncan, Tak Fujitani, Serk-bae Suh, and Ken Wells read the entire book manuscript or key chapters, and their suggestions vastly improved the book's arguments and their presentation. The book went in new and exciting directions after Emily Anderson kindly shared her work on Japanese Christian missionaries in colonial Korea, and George Kallander helped me avoid any serious misinterpretations of Tonghak thought through our informative conversations. I also want to thank Paul Chang, Lisa Kim Davis, Ken Kawashima, Gene Park, Ann Sherif, and Len Smith for showing me different ways to study history and sharing their belief in the book project.

Scholars in Korea have played pivotal roles both in helping me obtain invaluable historical resources and in providing critical feedback on my work. Not only has Kim Dong-no's work pushed the boundaries of my own work, but he has always generously arranged space for me to work at Yonsei University, especially providing me with an extremely comfortable office in the Institute for State Governance Studies in 2010–2011. Both Hong Song-chan and the late Pang Kie-chung introduced me to an exciting way of studying Korean history and have shared their wisdom over meals and classroom discussions. I was very fortunate to have received feedback on the book during its early stages from Professor Pang before he passed away. Finally, Chung Kyu-sik, Chang Shin, Pak Hyon, and Park Yun-jae went out of their way to share valuable resources with me.

I have been extremely fortunate to have the opportunity to present my work and receive feedback at several institutions: Chonnam University, Cornell University, Robinson College at Cambridge University, Seoul National University, UCLA, the University of California–Berkeley, the University of Michigan–Ann Arbor, and the University of Southern California (especially the Rising Star Workshop 2010). This book project has been generously supported by the Dean of Faculty Office at Claremont McKenna College, Fulbright Hays (Doctoral Dissertation Research Abroad) and Fulbright Hays (Faculty Research Abroad), the Henry Luce Foundation, and the Korea Foundation.

I am especially grateful to my editor, Masako Ikeda, for her help. She has been a firm believer in my work since I first presented her my book. Not only has she efficiently overseen my coedited book, but she has also diligently and swiftly guided this book through the complex review and editing process. This book would not have come to fruition without her work and support. I also want to thank Hannah Lim for carefully going over the romanization of Korean words.

My family has been the biggest supporter of my work. I want to thank my family in South Korea, especially Injung, for always taking care of me and later my wife and daughter when visiting Korea. Words cannot express how much I appreciate the love and support from my mother and father. From early on, when they cultivated my love for history by buying history books and cards for me, to their financial support for undergraduate, graduate, and language work, they have always believed in me and have had confidence that I will succeed in everything. This book is a result of their love and unending help. I especially want to thank my nephew, Andrew Park, who sadly passed away before the publication of this book after a heroic fight against cancer. Andrew was a quiet teenager who showed me how to endure and persevere through the toughest challenges and enjoy every moment of daily life. For me, his love and care for others, even when he was extremely ill, have been models for living each day. Andrew, I miss you dearly.

My greatest thanks go to my daughter, Margot, and my partner and wife, Jennifer. Margot's unconditional love, infectious smile, and wonderful imagination have sustained me over the past three years of writing this book. I especially want to thank her for being such a great sleeper, which allowed me to write a great deal of this book in the evening. Jennifer has been my biggest supporter since we first met at the University of Chicago. She not only has patiently read and commented on the entire manuscript but has also been a wonderful therapist who has kept me sane throughout writing this book. Her love for me has given me the power and freedom to think and act boldly with confidence. She has been the loving, compassionate, and wise anchor in my life, and I therefore dedicate this book to her.
