

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The British and the Turks depends on nearly fifty years of archival research. The large majority of documents that form the basis of the book came from the vast collections of the British National Archives. I especially praise the National Archives' liberal policies on reproductions, personal copying by researchers and online documents. Without these policies, it would have been impossible for anyone who did not live in London to do this type of research. The United States National Archives also provided valuable documents.

For books and articles, I particularly depended on the collection and online resources of the University of Louisville Library, especially its efficient Interlibrary Loan Department. Over the years, other major sources for my research have been the British Library, the Library of Congress, the library of the School of African and Asian Studies, the Türk Tarih Kurumu, the Başbakanlık Arşivi, the ATASE SAREM Başkanlığı and many university libraries.

While the writing of this book was funded purely from my own bank account, many of the documents and books that formed the basis of this study were collected during previous projects. These were funded by the University of Louisville, the United States National Endowment for the Humanities and Department of Education, the Social Science Research Council, the Istanbul Chambers of Commerce, the Institute of Turkish Studies, the American Research Institute in Turkey, the Baykan Foundation and the İmre Foundation.

Those who assisted my research are too many to list. Prominent among them were Stanford J. Shaw, Şükrü Elekdağ, Heath Lowry, Kâmuran Gürün, Melih Berk, Hakan Yavuz and Andrew Mango. Librarians and archivists, most of whose names I never knew, aided me always.

As always, my greatest debt is to my wife, Carolyn Beth, and my family – Justin Nicholas, Caitlin Elizabeth, Anne Maureen and John Patrick. They have always been my support, and they contributed greatly to this work with valuable advice and suggestions, editing, proofreading and by copying thousands of documents in the British National Archives. The British and the Turks particularly benefitted from John Patrick's manuscript editing and Elizabeth Welsh's copy-editing.

I thank them all.

*Justin McCarthy,
Louisville, Kentucky,
April 2021*

