

Acknowledgements

This book exists because Jane Millgate decided, years ago, that I should write a sequel to her Walter Scott: The Making of the Novelist, focusing on the novels of the 1820s. Her continuing mentorship introduced me to the community of scholars whose stimulating work and supportive questions and comments at the International Walter Scott Conferences advanced my own thinking. I wish I had room to thank them individually for the editorial and critical scholarship that provided the scaffolding for this book, and for friendships that have spanned decades and continents. They have all contributed to the thinking that went into this book.

Ian Duncan has been an extraordinary enabler of this book, as reader, interlocutor, advisor, and the most meticulous and generous editor I've ever encountered. I thank him and Penny Fielding for their faith in this project. I also thank the external evaluators for their endorsement and their productive suggestions for revisions. The team at EUP has been unfailingly responsive and helpful. Emily Sharp, Elizabeth Fraser and Fiona Conn provided detailed and almost instantaneous answers to sometimes dim-witted questions with the kind of personal attention that any author craves. I thank Andrew Kirk for careful copy-editing and Zubin Meer for producing a thorough and logical index.

Portions of this book appeared in earlier forms. Chapters 6–8 are expanded versions of 'Monarchy and the Middle Period Novels' in The Edinburgh Companion to Walter Scott (2012); Chapter 10 was published in Romanticism 21.2 (2015) as 'Historical Redgauntlet: Jacobite Delusions and Hanoverian Fantasies'; Chapter 11 appeared in YES 47 (2017) as "'This Right of Mercy": The Royal Pardon in Scott's The Heart of Midlothian'. I am grateful for permission to include these materials in this book.

My former departmental colleagues Maria Frawley and Robert McRuer remain dear friends who offer delightful evenings of stimulating intellectual conversation punctuated by irreverent gossip. My PhD students became authentically interested in Walter Scott when I was developing this project and continue to be a vibrant part of my scholarly and social life. I'm grateful to them all, and especially to Danny Atherton, who took time away from his dissertation to provide crucial technical help in formatting this manuscript.

My family and friends have been a steady source of encouragement. I must single out Deborah Douglas and Rebecca Bushnell for regularly 'forgetting' to talk about their own scholarship to focus on mine. Gordon Turnbull was always both a support and a resource, reading early versions of chapters, suggesting better wording, attending Scott conferences, and listening patiently to hours (and years) of dithering. Finally, I thank my daughter Astra Wallace and son-in-law Ray Tillotson for making family time such a joyous distraction from solitary work.

To Jane Millgate,
in loving memory
