To Bill Brown I owe the opportunity and the encouragement to think deeply about things in literature. His collection of essays, Things, appearing as a special issue of Critical Inquiry in 2001, together with the publication of his own study in 2003 whose title so happily invoked Campanella, The Sense of Things, fetched my ideas into focus, and what I offer here is really an expansion and wider application of the argument I formulated then, entitled “Modern Metamorphoses and Disgraceful Tales.” The influence of him and his colleagues at Chicago, notably Sandra Macpherson, Heather Keenleyside, and Jim Chandler, is plainly evident throughout. The conversation of Chris Pinney, and his work on South Asian chromolithography and photography, has been an inspiration to me since the beginning of this enterprise.

I record my gratitude to Joe Meisel and the Andrew W. Mellon Foundation for funding two summers of graduate seminars at Vanderbilt from 2006–7. They were called “The Souls of Brute and Stupid Things” and attracted students whose enthusiasm was a great fillip to all of us who taught them: Lynn Enterline, Colin Dayan, and David Wood (all from Vanderbilt), Oliver Berghof (San Marcos and Irvine), Mark Blackwell (Hartford) Wolfram Schmidgen (Washington University), Helen Thompson (Northwestern), Sandra Macpherson (Ohio State), Tony Brown (Minnesota), Frank Palmeri (Florida), and Heather Keenleyside (Chicago). Their collaboration was invaluable. During 2005–6, I held the R. Stanton Avery Distinguished Fellowship at the Huntington Library which put me in the middle of an opulent archive where many a vagrant idea was brought to heel. To Roy Ritchie and the trustees I am grateful for that opportunity. A visiting fellowship in 2008–9 at Kings College, Cambridge caused me to gather in and consolidate all the information I had assembled over the previous eight years. I thank the Provost and the Fellows for their hospitality, and in particular Peter de Bolla and Alex Regier for the rigorous scrutiny they gave three of my chapters over as many days of intense discussion early in 2009. To my respondents at that event, Markman Ellis and Andrea Haslanger, and to Peter de Bolla, who chaired each of the sessions, I am much indebted. Concurrently in the Michaelmas Term of 2008 I held a fellowship at the Centre for Research in the Arts, Social Sciences and Humanities. To the staff at CRASSH, and to Professor Mary Jacobus, the director, I say a big thank you.

Julie Park read an early version of the chapter 2, and Michael McKeon and Nick Paige read chapter 7, offering observations and suggestions from which I have benefited. Two anonymous readers at Princeton University Press gave me splendid advice about the structure of the argument, which I hope I have followed. During my visits to Cambridge over the last five years Mark Phillips has been an invaluable interlocutor, and I thank him for his patience. Between 2009–10 the History Department at Vanderbilt ran a stimulating series of seminars on things under the direction of Gary Gerstle, and I am glad I was invited to contribute to it. In the Fall Term of 2009 Lynn Enterline and I jointly taught an undergraduate class on metamorphosis. I hope it was as exciting for the students as it was for me; certainly a good number of the ideas we discussed appear in the following pages. Last Spring, Nick Paige and I convened a colloquium at Vanderbilt under the rubric of “The History of Fiction,” and this afforded me a view of the topic that influenced considerably the last revision of The Things Things Say. Nick Paige, Margaret Cohen, April Alliston, Michael McKeon, Francoise Lavocat, Lynn Festa, Andrea Haslanger, and Mark Phillips all deserve my thanks for the range and subtlety of what they brought to the table.

Without the extremely generous policy for leave and research funding of Vanderbilt University, I doubt if this book could have been written. Richard McCarty and Carolyn Dever, successive deans, deserve thanks for their active faith in the project, also my chair Jay Clayton for his goodwill, and Janis May, Susan Crisafulli, Dan Spoth, Amanda Hagood, Beau Baca, Amanda Johnson, Adam Miller, and Killian Quigley for all the work they have done on my behalf. My wife Bridget Orr has throughout the decade been a cheerful supporter, and Charlie, to whom I dedicate the book, has proved an exemplary enthusiast for things of all sorts—fleets of wooden boats, squadrons of paper aeroplanes and battalions of tin soldiers have defined his association with frogs, tadpoles, fish, water and most especially mud.
