

Acknowledgments

I could not have conducted the research for this book had it not been for the assistance that Japanese and American colleagues and friends so willingly gave me. In Japan, medical specialists, paramedicals, and counselors in social work and family planning offered not only their time for interviews and discussions, but administered my questionnaires to their clients, provided me with introductions to other specialists as well as to prospective married couples for interviews, and—not least of all—encouraged me with their active interest in my research questions and the outcome of my efforts. Among the midwives, family counselors, and social workers, I wish to thank especially: Baba Tetsu, Chiga Yūko, Endō Kimiko, Fukazawa Michiko, Kanamatsu Sachiko, Katō Kayoko, Maruyama Misako, Mimori Toshiko, Nakayama Masu, Satō Shigeiko, Satō Tae, and Tado Shizu. Among the physicians, who include specialists in private practice as well as educators, researchers, and administrators, I offer special thanks to: Kaneko Eiju, Maruyama Kazuo, Matsunaga Masaru, the late Muramatsu Hiroo, Muramatsu Minoru, Narabayashi Yasushi, Nitta Takeo, Nozue Genichi, Ōmura Kiyoshi, Ōtsuka Shōji, Satō Tsuneharu, Sugai Masatomo, Sugiyama Shirō, Tsuboi Hideo, Yamada Tetsuo, and Wagatsuma Takashi.

There were many social scientists who also gave freely of their time and energy. I feel particularly indebted to Shinozaki Nobuo, a fellow anthropologist who became Director-General of the Institute for Population Problems during my period of research in Japan. I also owe much to Aoi Kazuo, my advisor at the University of Tokyo, Hara Hiroko, and Yuzawa Yasuhiko. Students in the social sciences and health fields also gave me their help, and I also gained from their insights and expertise. Karasawa Yukiko generously extended numerous efforts. My special thanks also go to Hatō Mayumi, Kojima Hideo, Mutō Seiei, and Yamazaki Reiko.

Help came also from the ranks of various feminist groups.

I cannot overemphasize the extent to which the results of the intensive interviews with wives benefited from the skills and sensitivity of Sawanobori Nobuko, a self-employed marketing research specialist whom I first met through the Three Points Women's Project. Yamada Mitsuko, an activist in childbirth issues, provided indispensable aid and encouragement as well. My thanks also go to Iwatsuki Sumie, formerly of the Three Points organization, and the members of Himonji and the Shinjuku Lib Center. Friends gave me invaluable assistance at every stage of research. Tamura Shuji helped with a myriad of tasks and problems involved in relocating to Japan for an extended period, with assistance that began long before my research actually commenced. Despite her own demanding schedule, Eleanor Westney guided me through my initiation to computer data processing. Friends also provided important research contacts and information: my special thanks to Tom and Wenda Paton, Sunada Toshiko, and George and Willa Tanabe.

Various public and private institutions also provided valuable assistance, chief among them the Japanese government's Institute of Population Problems, with which I enjoyed an unofficial affiliation during the course of field research. I also thank the staffs of the Japanese Organization for International Cooperation in Family Planning, the Mainichi Newspapers' Population Research Council, the Japan Family Planning Federation, the Japan Association for Sex Education, and the Japan Association for Sex Research.

After field work, institutions and individuals in the United States gave me the assistance that enabled me to write this book. The task of turning data into a dissertation was helped along immeasurably by the cooperation I enjoyed from the staff at Columbia University's East Asian Institute, where I held a one-year affiliation as Junior Fellow until 1978. The resources, time, and assistance indispensable in producing a manuscript were made available to me by the Carolina Population Center in the course of a postdoctoral fellowship in population studies that began in 1979. Through courses and colloquia, as well as informal discussions, my colleagues at the Population Center gave me new insights and knowledge about important population-related issues as well as more sophisticated quantitative approaches to my data. My thanks go especially to Ronald Rindfuss and J. Richard Udry. Judy Kovenock and her staff made my use of the center's computer services simple and pain-free—no small feat—and Nancy Dole Runkle, through her programming skills, turned a semi-anarchic collection of text and tables into a very respectable looking manuscript. Lynn Igoe provided valuable editing help as well as welcome guidance in the mechanics of publishing a book. Kandi Stinson helped me through the maze of statistical testing techniques. Three colleagues at other institutions, Peggy Barlett (Emory University), John Money (Johns Hopkins University), and Patricia Steinhoff (University of Hawaii) gave me suggestions that greatly improved the rewritten manuscript.

My need for assistance from Japanese colleagues did not end with field work; a few Japanese associates have been burdened with my requests for clarifications, updates, and information to fill in gaps left standing when my field work ended. My deepest thanks for the kind and prompt replies to my inquiries go to Shinozaki Nobuo and his staff members at the Institute for Population Problems, as well as to Tomita Kōichi, Wagatsuma Hiroshi and Wagatsuma Takashi. Karasawa Yukiko and Yamada Mitsuko also gave me valuable supplementary information, and Kataoka Hiroko gave me useful suggestions regarding translations.

Books in the social sciences cannot be written without money—money for training, money for research, and money for writing. I feel obligated to make this undeniable, albeit crass, point in my acknowledgments because my country has entered an era of drastically reduced social science funding. I feel particularly grateful for the support that I have received, but I deeply regret the current trend that is making it more and more difficult for studies such as mine ever to materialize. My field research was supported by a dissertation research grant from the Social Science Research Council, and the writing of the dissertation by an award from the Japan Foundation. The postdoctoral fellowship that enabled the writing of this book was funded by the Public Health Service of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services.

Other individuals in the United States and Japan deserve thanks. I can only hope that whatever insight and information that I have had to offer, and the bonds of good will formed in the course of the research, will in some small way reciprocate their assistance.

NOTE

Japanese vocabulary, phrases, and proper names have been transliterated, using Hepburn romanization as it is used in Kenkyusha's New Japanese-English Dictionary, and names of individuals appear with the the family name preceding given name, in accordance with Japanese usage.

The results of statistical tests have been judged significant when they attain the .05 level of probability or less.

All monetary figures have been converted from yen into United States dollars at the rate of ¥ 280 to one dollar, the rate that prevailed during the time of field work.
