Acknowledgments

It would have been impossible for me to complete this project without the assistance of the many teachers, colleagues, friends, and relatives who made my protracted search for the meanings of Wei Baqun's life and revolution a pleasant and fruitful learning experience.

In Nanning, Fan Honggui and Chen Xinde were very generous in sharing both source materials and insights with me. So did Ya Yuanbo in Hechi. In Baise, the Municipal Office of the CCP History and the Municipal Archives both opened their doors to me and Wei Yongmei was particularly helpful. The Baise Uprising Memorial Hall granted me the right to use the image of a statue of Wei Baqun in this book. In Donglan, the four researchers at the Office of the CCP History, Huang Haoye, Shi Jietai, Wang Honghua, and Wei Hui twice received me and offered me numerous books they had written and edited. Wang Hao of the Political Consultative Conference of Donglan provided some very useful and hard to find locally published books and journals.

Wu Yixiong of Sun Yat-sen University and Pan Jiao of Minzu University granted me valuable opportunitiues to present my research to their colleagues and their very bright students.

Stephen Uhalley Jr., Paul Hansen, Bruce Bigelow, and Li Huaiyin all read the entire manuscript and David Mason read the first two chapters. They all provided very helpful suggestions. I also benefited from conversations with the late Jerry Bentley, Richard L. Davis, Edward Shultz, Huang Xingqiu, and Huang Ying, as well as various forms of assistance from Monte Broaded, Antonio Menendez, Bob Holm, and Scott Swanson.

Susan Berger of the Irwin Library of Butler University was very efficient in acquiring a large number of books and articles I requested through the interlibrary loan service. Matthew Jager of the Butler University Writer's Studio provided editorial assistance for the first draft of the manuscript.

The two grants I received in 2010 from the Butler University Institute for Research and Scholarship and the Chiang Ching-kuo Foundation for International Scholarly Exchange, which were for another project, enabled me to travel to Guangxi and other places to pursue my sideline research for this book.

The two anonymous reviewers for the SUNY Press provided very enlightened and constructive general comments and specific suggestions. Roger Ames and Nancy Ellegate were as helpful this time as they were in the publication of my first book. Eileen Nizer, Jessica Kirschner, Ryan Morris, and Michael Campochiaro were very prompt and patient in offering guidance and assistance with regard to the production of the book.

My former teachers, the late Wu Wenhua in Xiamen, Li Yifu in Beijing, Daniel Kwok, and Truong Buu Lam in Hawaii, were always ready to enrich me with their wise advice and enliven me with their kind encouragement.

Within my family, my wife Liu Meng read both the first and the final draft and made numerous corrections; my brother Yongqing helped purchase a number of very useful old books; and my son Bo Ning read part of the manuscript and also served as a first-class technical assistant.

I am profoundly grateful to all the people and institutions mentioned above as well as to many whose names do not appear here.
