This book is the outcome of a gradual discovery of the spiritual archaeology of Upstate New York. It began in the late 1960s when my mother, Stephanie Allfree Godwin, introduced me to Woodstock's Old Catholic Archbishop (Father Francis) and to devotees of Meher Baba, and when I discovered Anthony Damiani in his Ithaca bookstore (see chapter 25). In 1989 I met John Patrick Deveney, an authority on spiritualist history, to whom I am most grateful for reading this book in manuscript, and for his and Dr. Penny Asbell's hospitality in New York City. At the same time, I met Leslie Price, founder of the journals Theosophical History and Psypioneer and encourager of my work from that day to this. Much later, Marc Demarest added his rich fund of data in the website "Chasing Down Emma," and his ever-ready willingness to mine it for his friends' benefit. Madis Senner helped to define my project with his website Mother Earth Prayers: Places of Prayer in Greater Upstate New York, and his short-lived Spirit House Society inspired my first phase of research. Tom Tryniski's online collection of local newspapers at fultonhistory.com was an enormous help in this.

Others have helped through conversations or correspondence: Joseph Caezza and Mark Stavish with their deep knowledge of esoteric traditions; Eugenia Victoria Ellis with her dissertation on Claude Bragdon; John Gallucci and Tom Klenck, companions on long drives around the state; Layne Little, with materials on Mormonism; Mildred E. Logan and Wade Jacobson at the Temple of Truth in Freeville. For their many comments, hints, and ideas, some that they themselves may not recall, I thank Milton Chapin, Deborah Belle Forman, Cathy Gutierrez, Brenda and Rosemary

Hayes, Alvin Holm, John Leidenfrost, Jack Loop, Thom Metzger, Zac Moore, Bruce Moser, John Nelson, John Patane, Einar Petander, Marjorie Roth, James A. Santucci, Avery Solomon, Carl Stearns, Pringle Symonds, Andy Tetlow, Hugh Urban, John Anthony West, Judith Wellman, Thomas Willard, Peter Lamborn Wilson, Mason Winfield, Anthony Wonderley, and Melanie Zimmer. Among the friends no longer with us, Phyllis Benjamin, John Michell, and Nicholas Goodrick-Clarke all took an interest in this, as in my previous projects.

At Colgate University, the Upstate Institute has generously supported this project, especially through publishing my study of the Spirit House in Georgetown, for which I thank Ellen Kraly, Meika Loe, and Julie Dudrick. I also thank Colgate University's Research Council for grants in support of my travel around the state, and the Division of the Humanities for enabling me to give papers on this topic at the conferences of the European Society for the Study of Western Esotericism in Strasburg and the Association for the Study of Esotericism in Davis, California.

Among the libraries and historical societies of New York State, I especially thank Christian Goodwillie, Curator of Rare Books and Special Collections at Hamilton College, for opening the resources of the Communal Societies Collection to me and for providing many of the illustrations in the present book. Andrea G. Reithmayr, Curator of Rare Books at the University of Rochester Library, shared her intimate knowledge of Claude Bragdon and gave me access to his papers. I also thank Norman Carlson of the Fenton History Center, Jamestown; David Corson of the Kroch Library, Cornell University; Jerry Dale and Phyllis Evans of the Georgetown Historical Society; Holly Hewitt of the Marion Skidmore Library, Lily Dale; Sarah Keen of Colgate University Library's Special Collections; Barbara Kittle of the Daniel A. Reed Library of SUNY Fredonia; Denise A. Roe of the Madison County Archives, Wampsville; Joyce Hackett Smith of the Cayuga-Owasco Lakes Historical Society, Moravia; John Paul Wolfe of the McClurg Museum, Westfield; and the guides at the visitors centers of the Mormon sites at Palmyra and the Whitmer Farm. My son, Ariel Godwin, designed and drew the four maps. My wife, Janet, read the book in manuscript and suggested many improvements of style and expression. Neither she nor anyone else named above is responsible for any infelicities, solecisms, or errors that remain.
