

Acknowledgments

This book has been writing itself from the earliest days of my childhood. At a tender age, my incredibly creative parents gifted me with a storied existence. Real and fictional stories filled my childhood in conversations at my mom's dinner table, in my dad's weekly public library excursions and in my invented worlds in the backyard with my siblings, Bob Mishra and Krissy Carrington. I am grateful to my fabulous, loving, and delightfully flawed family for giving me such a vibrant and heartfelt world of stories with which to become someone. A life lived in story is a gift that I pass on to my children and students.

My work is indebted to the thought and support of my mentor and dear colleague Deborah Britzman. In her many books, Professor Britzman opened my mind to the infinite, creative possibility of freedom of the inner world. Her teaching gifted me with a magical, incisive vocabulary that brings form and meaning to my faltering phrase. And although these words are mine, this book, Deborah, is written with our conversations in mind.

Children and students inspire and press me to think, teach, and write in service of others. Although there are too many to mention here, I wish to acknowledge my brief time with one student, Abshir Hassan, a brilliant, gentle, and kind person whose life was taken too quickly and violently at the merciless hands of another. The final pages of this book contain a trace of my grief at the thought of the world bereft of you, Abshir. Our encounter was too brief yet profound. Your words and memory will influence our shared struggle and commitment to do justice to the unique potential of each student in our classrooms and in schools and in the worlds beyond both.

My colleagues and friends at York University continue to shape and support my intellectual and emotional life. In particular I give thanks to Steve Alsop, Chloe Brushwood-Rose, Roopa Desai-Trilokekar, Susan Dion, Rishma Dunlop, Troy Fraser, Esther Fine, Jen Gilbert, John Ippolito, David Lewkovich, Celia Haig-Brown, Didi Khayatt, Naomi Norquay, Lyndon Martin, Alice Pitt, Kim Tavares, Diane Vetter, Sue Winton, and the late Patrick Solomon, who believed in me from the minute we first met.

Smaro Kamboureli recognized something compelling about my work when I was a doctoral student, and so unsure and unsteady with my thought. Raw versions of this book were presented at three conferences hosted by Professor Kamboureli's TransCanada Literary Institute. In many ways this book was written in dialogue with many talented colleagues in attendance at these scholarly venues. Thank you so much Smaro for including me in this incredible bounty of thought and creation, and for bringing attention to the important work of Canadian literary writers, poets, critics, and emerging scholars in the national and international scene.

As important as the chance to publicly present this work at the Institute is the generative response of my brilliant, literary colleagues. For their ongoing provocation of literary ideas, I am grateful to Phanael Antwi, Diana Brydon, Christian Bök, Richard Cassidy, David Charandy, Lily Cho, Amber Dean, Jill Didur, Kit Dobson, Angela Facundo, Jade Ferguson, Len Findlay, Terry Goldie, Jennifer Henderson, Nat Hurley, Mark Lipton, Ashok Mathur, Roy Miki, Sophie McCall, Mark McCutcheon, Elan Paulson, Donna Penne, Julie Rak, Stephen Slemon, Pauline Wakeham, and the late Barbara Godard.

For his contribution to my literary ideas and his hospitable reception of my work, I am grateful to Daniel Coleman. Professor Coleman's acute and sublime thought of the co-existential significance of an examined and meditative literary life resonates so deeply in mine. I continue to learn from his books that travel through inside lives and across social difference.

Tracy Chapman, J. M. Coetzee, Jacques Derrida, Carolyn Forché, Toni Morrison, and Bruce Springsteen teach me that one does not have to know someone to be greatly affected by their words, service, and existence. I continue to learn how to read, write, and live from these writers of infinite and possible humanity. Their words pull me through the best and darkest of times.

Close friendship is the most critical element of intellectual work. I thank Lisa Farley for holding constantly the more difficult aspects of my thinking, RM Kennedy for his sensitive, erudite, and loving insight, David Errington for his courage and fight in an unfair world, Daniel Yon for reminding me that some reservation in communication is necessary, Mario Di Paolantonio for demonstrating the fiercest of thought is also gentle, Don Dippo for his insistence of justice through service, Judith Robertson for her sense of beauty and priority for all living things that deserve love and attention, Sarah Twomey for her world of adventure and love of small things, Debbi Sonu, for her gift of dance, Julie Bryd-Clarke and Steve Clarke for their infectious love of story, Andre Carrington for his musical voice, Colin Couchman for his thoughts on books and film and for his care of my family, Kent den Heyer for the laughter, Nicholas Ng-Fook for his open invitation to wonder, Rubén Gaztambide-Fernández for lifting my thought, Jen Blair for lifting my spirit, and Warren Crichlow for his exquisite notes on the pressing matter of living in the world with others. I am always grateful to Andy and Betty Tarc and to Glenn and Shirley Eastabrook, who are teachers and second parents to Paul Tarc and me.

I greatly appreciate the support of Beth Bouloukos, Jenn Bennett, and the editorial staff at SUNY Press, throughout the publication process. First books are precious objects and I thank the editors and anonymous reviewers for the close attention and care they have taken with my thought and writing. I also thank Deborah Britzman for supporting this work for publication in the SUNY series: Transforming subjects: Psychoanalysis, culture, and studies in education.

I thank both Sage Publications (www.sagepub.com) and Taylor and Francis Publications (www.tandfonline.com) for their permission to draw from earlier versions of this work. Parts of chapter 1 were originally published as “Literacy of the Other: The Inner Life of Literacy,” in the Journal of Early Childhood Literacy. An earlier version of chapter 4 was originally published as “Disturbing Reading. J. M. Coetzee’s ‘The Problem of Evil,’” in the journal Changing English. I wish to give a special mention to Jane Miller, chief editor of Changing English for her much-needed and generous support of young scholars with innovative approaches to literacy, literary thought, and literature.

I am thankful for the support of my many academic colleagues at home and in the world: Vanessa Andreotti, Nina Asher, Tamara Bibby, Kate Cairns, Sara Childer, Roland Sintos Coloma, Stephanie Daza, Kari Dehli, Lynn Mario De Souza, Jane Kenway, Carl Leggo, Magda Lewis, Jeong-Eun Rhee, Fazal Rizvi, Lisa Taylor, Ricky Varghese, and Lisa Weems. Their enthusiastic reception of my work and mind makes me brave. I also thank Stephanie Springgay and Debra Freedman for their commitment to scholarship on and by (m)others. As well I thank all my colleagues at the Postcolonial SIG at AERA and the Canadian Association of Curriculum Studies for continuing to support my thinking. I acknowledge the Social Science and Humanities Council of Canada for funding various presentations of my work and for supporting the publication of early versions of this work.

Even with a brilliant intellect and voracious passion for reading, my father, Anu Mishra, would see his mind, memory, and desire tested in the twilight of his life with the onset of dementia. In this time of great anguish, consoling us all, are stories of his mother, mother tongue, motherland retold by my beautiful, inventive, and caregiving mother, Chhaya Mishra. These days his unthinkable experience brings home the significance of literacy situated in an immigrant's childhood. It is his maternal experience of language in the earliest moments of his life and his adult life with my mother that comfort and compel him now to keep living, with quality and meaning, despite or in spite of facing the cruelest of mentally lived conditions. Now as ever, in their struggle to coexist and survive the fantastic and existential ravages of lost memory, my parents urge me to read, write, love, and live as if every single person's life depended on it. Now as ever I am reminded of the great existential significance of literacy of the Other in the bittersweet family story of our lives.

Among all, I profoundly thank Paul Tarc, my first and faithful reader, for his quiet companionship, generous mind, and incredible capacity for care, and for carrying so painstakingly my faltering thoughts and fragile feeling in his heart. From you and our four beautiful children, Gabi, Ana, Rebecca, and James, I am gifted with a story of meaningful existence of love, struggle, acceptance, and reparation. A thought of you, Paul, is in every word I write. You mean everything to me.

I dedicate this book to the late Dr. Roger I. Simon whom I met in words in his first book. You changed my life for good, Roger. Our face-to-face encounters in memory, in writing, and in mind sustain me.
