WHAT A JOY TO BE WITH DAVID on this long journey into Rubinstein's fascinating life. We traveled to Paris many times and to St. Petersburg, New York, and Washington, DC, seeking the sources of this mystery woman. And he keenly read through many drafts of my manuscript. Lynn Garafola inspired me to dig into the exotic and occasionally puzzling career of Rubinstein and warmly gave me valuable advice. I thank my daughter Ninotchka for her insight and cheer in the course of our many conversations about Rubinstein. Our children Rachel and Aaron and grandchildren, Hannah, Max, Jacob, Mariana, and Jonah deserve a hug and a bravo for seeing me through another long research project. I am deeply grateful to my most trusted friend, Kathy Milazzo, who read through the text a number of times and helped me to critique and shape the narrative in its different forms. She beautifully sliced and augmented it when necessary.

Assisting me with the Russian translations were Tamara Tomasson and Eric Newton. Tamara carefully decoded articles, while all along Eric shared the ways the Russians characterized Rubinstein, and he directed me to the fascinating digital film of her dancing. Sarah Williams Gonzales immediately offered her capable services in seeking the sources of various photos of Rubinstein. Since the beginning of my writing career, Nancy Zeckendorf has encouraged me to tread the sometimes difficult trails that one must pursue when doing research. Another dear friend, Beth Aldrich, led me to rich and promising materials held at the Library of Congress, while Judith Brin Ingber gracefully supplied her encyclopedic knowledge of Jewish dancers and choreographers. She and Dawn Lille, comrades in every sense, dancers and writers, were always there for me. Early on in the course of working on this project, Tomi Kushner introduced me to a book on the life of Gabriele d'Annunzio, a major figure in Rubinstein's career. Jim Tuller generously and judiciously scanned the dance collection at the New York Public Library for photos of Rubinstein and relayed them to me; Walter Putnam's expertise on Paul Valéry enhanced my work on the livrets Valéry wrote for Rubinstein. Howard Sayette, my Metropolitan Opera Ballet partner who worked with Irina Nijinska, kindly sent me a version of Bronislava's Boléro; Mary Anne Newhall, a dear colleague, sought out books and articles that were of great value in the course of writing this book. Liora Bing-Heidecker also informed me of new sources germane to this project. I am deeply indebted to Bruce Robertson, former director of the University of California, Santa Barbara Art, Design & Architecture Museum, who graciously helped me to attain permissions for artwork. I must also gratefully thank Richard Sorensen from the Smithsonian Museum for his patience and kindness in helping me with the Romaine Brooks paintings.

The many hours of research in libraries here and abroad were aided and abetted by some of the most selfless people—the librarians and their staff. I am profoundly grateful to Daisy Pommer, Andrea Felder, and Arlene Yu, the Collections manager at the New York Public Library for the Performing Arts, who pointed me to the photos I needed and really supported me in that endeavor. Linda Murray, curator for the New York Public Library Jerome Robbins Dance Division, deserves kudos for her passionate delight in helping those working on all aspects of dance research. It is a pleasure to note my indebtedness to SUNY's Jenn Bennett-Genthner for her gracious help with copyediting. I must also recognize the many librarians in Paris, who patiently directed me to the relevant files I needed, especially those at the Bibliothèque de l'Opéra, the Arts du spectacle, and the Jacques Doucet collections.

Finally, I'd like to offer a boisterous shout out and thank you to Richard Carlin for being a steadfast and loyal believer in my work and my terrific editor for several of my books, including this one.
