

Acknowledgments

This book has been an immense pleasure to write, granting me the opportunity to pursue a field and a corpus significantly different from my previous research in cultural memory studies. The enjoyment I have felt comes largely as a result of discovering in queer theory a body of work that takes seriously what is often discarded as trivial, anomalous, or peripheral and that provides a way of critically understanding the personal attachments we nurture to the things we read and see. As any student or colleague in Cambridge will know from the spine-worn, sticky-noted copy of Cruising Utopia that sits upon my desk, I have found in many of the queer scholars I engage with in this book new ways of theorizing the world and of reflecting on academia's role within it. I am grateful to them, and to the directors included in this book, for their efforts in articulating and visibilizing these fundamentally queer structures of feeling.

It continues to be an enormous privilege to work with the undergraduate and postgraduate students at the University of Cambridge, whose critical insights, intellectual enthusiasm, and political drive prove to be a daily inspiration. The hours of supervision we have spent discussing the knots and urgencies of queer cinema and theory suffuse the pages that follow and the ideas within them. I am particularly thankful to students in IL1, SP13, and on the MPhils in Latin American studies and film and screen studies, whose perspectives on many of the films discussed in this book have regularly challenged my own; and to the PhDs in the Centre of Latin American Studies, whose intellectual ambition continues to be as impressive as it is inspiring.

I am grateful to the fellowships of Murray Edwards College, where this book began during an Early Career Research Fellowship, and of Gonville and Caius College, where the project entered its final stages. Many of the book's intellectual jagged edges and methodological infelicities were smoothed over during lunchtime discussions and coffee breaks, and I am deeply appreciative to work in an institution where so many colleagues show such curiosity for my work and the directions it takes. I am grateful in particular to Becca, Chris, Joe, Lila, Mike, and Victoria, a brigade who have offered their support, their encouragement, and their distraction, often in equal measure.

The broader Cambridge community has been a vibrant source of support in the development of this book. The Centre of Latin American Studies and the Section of Spanish and Portuguese have been intellectual homes for my work and for my teaching, offering me valuable opportunities to merge both through seminars, lectures, and workshops. I am particularly and forever indebted to Joanna Page and Geoffrey Kantaris, for their unswerving support and valued guidance since my arrival in Cambridge ten years ago, and to Brad Epps, for his intellectual engagement with this project and his generosity in funding and supporting the initiatives associated with it. The LGBTQ+@Cam program has played a special role in my time at Cambridge since its inception in 2018, introducing me to people, ideas, and ways of conducting research that have made this book go far beyond what it would have been without such inspiration. Outside Cambridge, the community of Hispanists that I count myself fortunate to be a part of continues to make research as meaningful as it is enjoyable. I am grateful to be able to consider a number of friends—Catherine, Dunja, Emily, Joey, Lucy, Natasha, Niall, Paul, and Rachel—as colleagues, too, and I look forward to many more conference reunions in the years to come.

An earlier version of chapter 1 was published in the Journal of Cinema and Media Studies as “The Queer Art of Feeling: Futurity, Fin de siglo and New Queer Realism,” 63, no. 5 (June 2024). An earlier version of chapter 4 was published in Screen as “Slow Waters: Marco Berger’s Taekwondo and the Queer Erotics of Boredom,” 61, no. 2 (Summer 2020, doi: 10.1093/screen/hjaa015), published by the University of Oxford Press. The permission to reprint versions of these publications in Bodies of Water is greatly appreciated.

Finally, my thanks go to my family in Northern Ireland and to Jens, who are all ceaselessly generous and steadfast in their support. Just as the epigraph to this book suggests about the nature of seawater, their love is both an abstraction and a thing in this world.
