

Acknowledgements

This book has benefited from connecting with the textual and theatrical past through rich archival resources, and I am grateful to the staffs of the Theatre Collection of the Victoria and Albert Museum; London Guildhall Library; the Fawcett Library which is now The Women's Library, London School of Economics (LSE), London; the Manuscripts Department of the British Library; the Mander and Mitchenson Theatre Collection; the John Pierpont Morgan Library; the Fales Collection at New York University; and the Lilly Library at Indiana University for their assistance. Closer to home, I am grateful to the staff of the City College Library, and especially Special Collections Librarian Sydney Van Nort. This work was supported in part by grants from the City University of New York PSC/CUNY Research Award Program.

I am warmly grateful to Patrick Brantlinger, Susan Gubar, Joss Marsh, Andrew Miller – mentors without whom this work would not have come into being – and to Johanna Frank for her encouraging friendship. Elaine Showalter, my first academic mentor, remains an inspiration and a support. The Adaptation and the Stage Colloquium at the University of Warwick in Spring 2015 and discussions that occurred at conferences of the North American Victorian Studies Association (NAVSA) have contributed to my thoughts in this manuscript. Sharon Aronofsky Weltman has changed the field of Victorian Studies by building new communities of theatre researchers, and I am particularly appreciative of the NAVSA Theater Caucus that she founded.

An earlier version of part of Chapter 3 appeared in 'The Exceptional Woman and Her Audience: Armstrong, Performance, and Authorship' in The George Eliot Review (2004), 38–45, and I thank the George Eliot Fellowship for permission to republish it here. Early versions of other portions of this book appeared in 'Child Killers and the Competition between the Late Victorian Theater and the Novel' in MLQ 66.2 (June 2005), and I thank its editorial staff and anonymous readers for their suggestions. Anonymous readers for Edinburgh University Press helped me to see this project in new ways. Michelle Houston, Ersev Ersoy, James Dale, Eliza Wright, Camilla Rockwood and their colleagues at Edinburgh University Press, as well as series editor Julian Wolfreys, made the final preparation of this book a pleasure.

While working on this book I served as chair of the City College English Department, and I was deeply appreciative of the cooperation and good will of its faculty. I would like to thank department programme directors and staff, in particular: Barbara Gleason, Yana Joseph, András Kiséry, Harold Veaser, Elizabeth Mazzola, Keith Gandal, Salar Abdoh, Emily Raboteau, Linsey Abrams and Rosaymi Santos. As current chair of English, Elizabeth Mazzola provided advice and support for the completion of this work. City College colleagues from within my department and across the college provided support, advice or inspiration, most particularly: Felicia Bonaparte, Bruce Cronin, Kevin Foster, Ellen Handy, David Jeruzalmi, the late Norman Kelvin, Christine Li, Rajan Menon, Glen Milstein, Mark Mirsky, Paul Oppenheimer and Josh Wilner. I would like to thank my undergraduate and MA students at City College for their thoughts and enthusiasm in discussing Victorian literature, especially Clara Boothby, Tyleen Kelly, John Kofron, Megan O'Donnell and Laura Wallace.

I am grateful for the support that I have received from deans in the City College Division of Humanities and the Arts over the years. J. Fred Reynolds provided opportunities and support that were critical to my professional growth. Geraldine Murphy has been a mentor, supporter and friend. Eric Weitz motivated me by example and precept to think ambitiously. Doris Cintrón is a model of feminist leadership and mentorship. Erec Koch has provided me with an opportunity to do useful, challenging work, and I am grateful for his support of my research and teaching.

In my own balancing of the worlds of work and home, I am fortunate to have family that have supported and nurtured me. Much reading, writing and revision for this project was undertaken while spending time with a warm family circle that gathers at the home of my father-in-law, Joel Miller. My mother, Patricia Kobetts, and my mother-in-law, Nan Miller, have given of their time and energy, enabling me to pursue my career knowing that my children were in the care of loving grandmothers. Both my mother and my father, Joseph Kobetts, devoted their lives to service in the New York City public schools. My father's love of history lives on in this book (and I wish he were here to read it), while my mother provided me my earliest view of women's work in the public world. My husband, Jethro Miller, and I met as undergraduates, and he has been a partner throughout the intellectual journey that lies behind this volume. His constant support as we have developed, pursued our respective careers and raised a family has made the worlds of work and home manageable and joyful. Finally, Sophie and Noah are my greatest passions and sources of pride. This book is dedicated, with much love, to them.