

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This book is the product of several stages of research involving different sets of colleagues, and my numerous debts of gratitude reflect this. My thanks are due first and foremost to the people of Madina and Malema chiefdom, for their warmth, friendship, cooperation and insight during the time that I lived with them. The original research for this book was funded by the Economic and Social Research Council (ESRC, award no. A00428624040), with additional fieldwork support from the Central Research Fund of the University of London. The MacArthur Foundation funded a subsequent period of fieldwork on which this book draws, under the auspices of the Institute of Development Studies 'Securities' project. I am grateful to all these funders.

In Sierra Leone, I should especially like to thank my research assistant, Mary Konima Williams, and Adama Idriss and family who continually provided a friendly alternative home for me in Bo. I was affiliated to the Institute of African Studies, Fourah Bay College, and the Department of Environmental Studies and Geography, Njala University College of the University of Sierra Leone. My thanks are due to Professor Magbaily Fyle of the former, and Dr Osman Bah, Dr Serrie Kamara, Dr Bob Kandeh and Esther Mokuwa of the latter, for the academic and material support they provided. At Njala, my thanks are also due to Dr Sillah of the Department of Biological Sciences who kindly helped me with the identification of fish species, and B. M. S. Turay and Mr Boboh of the National Herbarium who assisted with plant identification. Invaluable information and assistance was provided by staff of the Forestry Division of the Ministry of Agriculture, Natural Resources and Forestry, especially the late David Gabba, and by staff of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds and the Conservation Society of Sierra Leone, especially Peter Wood. Collaborative links with the University College London Gola Project provided an important context for this research. I am grateful for the encouragement, support and opportunity to share ideas offered by Paul Richards, Glyn Davies and others connected with the project.

This book draws on my doctoral dissertation, completed in the Department of Anthropology, School of Oriental and African Studies, London (SOAS), and was itself written while I was a Fellow of the Institute of Development Studies at the University of Sussex. Numerous London and Sussex colleagues provided invaluable academic and personal encouragement, including Elisabeth Croll, Richard Fardon, Philip Gatter, Robin Mearns, David Parkin and Paul Richards. I have had the opportunity to present a number of chapters at seminars and conferences. Chapter 2 formed the introduction to the 1991 seminar series on 'Women and Environment' at the Centre for Cross-cultural Research on Women, Queen Elizabeth House, Oxford, and was presented again at a SIDA workshop in Stockholm and in the social anthropology department at Sussex University. Earlier versions of Chapter 3 were discussed at the EIDOS conference on Cultural Understandings of the Environment at SOAS, 1989 and at the American Anthropological Association annual meeting 1991. Chapter 7 was presented to the University College London Biological Anthropology seminar, and parts of Chapters 1 and 6 were discussed in the IDS seminar series on 'Environmental Change, Development Challenges' and at the Centre of African Studies in Edinburgh. I am grateful to the organisers and participants in these seminars for the opportunity to air the material and for their helpful comments. Special thanks are due to Gerald and Penelope Leach for their support and inspiration. It is their back-up, and the kind efficiency of the International African Institute and Edinburgh University Press, which saw this book through to publication despite my absence on further West African fieldwork. Above all, thanks to James Fairhead, my colleague and partner. None of the people mentioned here are in any way responsible for the conclusions, judgements and errors in this book; these are mine alone.
