The first part of this book was written while I was holding an Alexander von Humboldt research fellowship at the University of Heidelberg in 2017–18. I would like to thank all the wonderful colleagues I met there, for their always stimulating discussions of the topics of this book, as of many others, and for making my time there wholly enjoyable. Special thanks are due to Chrys Chrysanthou, Jonas Grethlein, Luuk Huitink, Nikoletta Kanavou, Vasilis Liotsakis and Anna Lefteratou, who all became friends as well as colleagues. I also learned an enormous amount from trying out my ideas about ‘tragic’ history at the Forschungskolloquium not only in Heidelberg, but also on occasion in Mainz, Trier and Mannheim. Gratitude of another kind is due to my husband, Morten Wendt, who moved to Heidelberg with me for the year, and to my children, Hektor and Sophia, who gamely went to German school and kindergarten and ended up speaking the language more fluently than either of their parents.

The second part of the book was written, with much more effort, at intervals between teaching and administration at my home institution, the University of Glasgow. I want to thank my colleagues here for their patience in listening to me going on about ‘tragic’ history and immersion for years and for never saying (within my hearing, at least) that I was crazy for writing a book about fragments. Special thanks are due to Sean Adams, Andrew Morrison and Catherine Steel, who read all or part of the manuscript at a draft stage, and to Matthew Fox, Isabel Ruffell and Jamie Young, whose knowledge of ancient literary criticism, Aristotle, and critical fabulation respectively helped the project along at various stages.

Other people helped along the way. Thanks are, as always, due to Alexander Meeus for his support, encyclopaedic knowledge of scholarship and constructive criticism. Discussions with Emily Baragwanath, Christopher Burden-Strevens, Chris Baron, Andrew Feldherr, Robin Waterfield, Nicolas Wiater, Jaap Wisse and Tony Woodman have also been immensely helpful as well as enjoyable. Stefan Schorn generously read a draft of the chapter on the Peripatetics, and his comments made the result infinitely better. In the final stages, the comments of the series editors, Andrew Erskine and Benedikt Eckhardt, as well as the anonymous reader for the publisher, saved the book from various missteps and made the final result much more readable (and shorter). Any errors and infelicities that remain are, of course, my responsibility alone.
