

Rethinking Hellenistic Historiography

Edinburgh Studies in Hellenistic History and Culture

Series editors: Benedikt Eckhardt & Andrew Erskine

Embraces the diversity of the Hellenistic world, from Sicily to Babylonia and beyond

Today, the Hellenistic world is one of the largest and most vibrant fields in the study of antiquity. After centuries at the periphery, sandwiched between Classical Greece and Classical Rome, the period between Alexander's death and the battle of Actium is now thoroughly embedded into the historical study of the ancient world. The many innovations in political and literary culture that mark this period are now much better understood than in earlier, declinist models, and the increasing interconnectedness of the ancient world provides ample material for attempts to broaden the horizon of ancient history beyond the limits of traditional definitions.

The series aims to be a hub for excellent research in this field, consolidating existing strengths and setting research agendas for the future. Ranging from the late fourth to the late first century bce, it will cover all aspects of Hellenistic history and culture, taking an inclusive approach that does not privilege core regions such as Greece or Macedonia but gives equal weight to developments on the Western and Eastern fringes of the Hellenistic world. By publishing studies on Greece, Sicily and Mesopotamia alongside each other, the series will embrace a holistic approach to the period, demonstrating how specialist knowledge held in various subdisciplines within and beyond Classics needs to be pooled to come to terms with the rapidly accelerating connectivity that characterises the Hellenistic world.
