

Acknowledgements

It has taken nearly a decade to complete this book, during which time I have been incredibly lucky to have experienced so much generous support. I would like to take this opportunity to express thanks to the people who have helped me along the way, however insufficient this may be in reciprocating their acts of kindness.

It has been a pleasure to work with the team at Edinburgh University Press for their patience, understanding and co-operation, especially Rachel Bridgewater, Eddie Clark, Isobel Birks, Nicola Ramsey and Kirsty Woods; and their cover project manager Rhona Ginty. I also express sincere thanks to series editor Stephanie Cronin and the series editorial board, as well as to the two anonymous reviewers on the initial proposal for their extremely engaged feedback on the proposal. Thanks also to Eric Christianson for all his work on formatting and proofing, to Austin Gee for his meticulous help in proofing and indexing, and to Nancy Stevenson for running two excellent writing retreats that allowed me to finish writing the manuscript.

Academically, nobody has helped me more than Nelida Fuccaro, who supervised the PhD thesis at SOAS that this book is largely based on. Not only did Nelida offer consistent guidance in reading and providing such engaged feedback on countless drafts, but she also gave me space to pursue several intellectual paths independently. Since completing the PhD, she has been ever-present in helping me navigate the challenges of starting an academic career. I continue to learn so much from her in our ongoing collaborations and warmly appreciate the conviviality she has always exuded with Shaalan Farouk.

There are several other people I would like to thank for their help at SOAS during the early stages of research for this book. John Parker and Derek Mancini-Lander served on my PhD supervisory committee and offered very constructive feedback in the formative stages of the project. I am especially grateful for the support provided by John towards the end of the process and after. Attentive guidance from Shabnum Tejani, Roberto Mazza and Tara Povey also shaped the intellectual and methodological scope of early chapter drafts. Getting through the PhD would have been much harder without friends in the History cohort from my year, Brandi Simpson Miller, Mohamad El-Merheb, Nattanee Amornpradubkul, Peter Kwok Fai Law, Tyolumun Kinga-Upaa, Susannah Savage and Yinzi Wang, as well as Aditya Ramesh and Matthias Freidank from the year above. I am especially grateful to Mohamad, Susannah, Aditya and Matthias for all their moral support, career advice and many reading recommendations! I would also like to thank those who took the decision to offer me a SOAS research studentship, without which this work simply would not have been possible in the first place.

Much of the archival research for the project took place at the BP Archive at the University of Warwick. Over the years I have received so much assistance from the archivists there: Bethan Thomas, Joanna Burman and Peter Housego. Bethan and Joanna have especially gone out of their way to help in every way they can on the multiple occasions I have visited.

In addition, I have received invaluable support and mentorship from those not directly involved in the research project. Stephanie Cronin, whose scholarship initially inspired me to study modern Iranian social history, has given me so much invaluable career advice as an early career scholar, and has supported countless applications. Likewise, I have long been inspired by the oeuvre of Tim Mitchell, but in recent years I have been very fortunate in directly benefiting from his boundless generosity and wisdom. Touraj Atabaki and Andrew Barry provided some of the most engaged feedback I have ever received as examiners on my PhD viva and continued to support me after, along with John Parker, Tara Povey, Elaheh Rostami-Povey and Eleanor Newbiggin. Eleanor also provided such fantastic mentorship in my early years of teaching at SOAS, as did Kerem Nişancıoğlu and Meera Sabaratnam, giving me opportunities to greatly broaden my knowledge. I am very grateful to Victor Seow and Laleh Khalili for reading drafts of the introduction and offering such helpful feedback.

I developed this book manuscript during teaching and postdoctoral fellowships at SOAS, 2021 to 2023. During this time perhaps no one shaped my thinking more than Hengameh Ziai, who also generously read drafts of chapters. Hengameh and I taught together on modern Middle East history and co-organised a conference on 'Histories of Capitalism and Race' at SOAS in 2022, all of which profoundly influenced my engagement with critical political economy and postcolonial theory. So much of my thinking and the book's framing is down to our conversations and friendship over the years, and, above all, to her brilliance. Thanks also to our special group of students who taught me so much. Likewise, during this period I was extremely lucky to become close friends at SOAS with Ana Nenadović, who has completely broadened my intellectual horizons. More than this, she has supported me immensely and has been one of the best friends I could hope to have.

This book has also been shaped by two public seminar series on 'Histories of Capitalism and Race in the Middle East and Beyond' that I co-convened with Hengameh Ziai and Sarah El-Kazaz as part of the SOAS Walter Rodney Collective. I am so lucky to work with them in building a space for a special intellectual community, and so appreciative for their unwavering comradeship as we have been pushed to the limit of our working capacity. I have learnt a great deal from our speakers, student discussants and comrades in attendance, and our discussions have informed the framing of the book in the final stages of writing. I would also like to thank the SOAS research office, especially Tatiana Lima and Simon Vitting, for their steadfast support; to Ceyda Karamursel, Andrea Janku and Wayne Dooling, for their intellectual input and initiative; and to Ayman Shihadeh, for backing our efforts as head of department. Finally, I am so grateful for the tireless organisational and promotional work done for the series by João Moreira da Silva, Ellan Lincoln-Hyde, Ada Ferraresi, Iona Summerson, John Michael Gurklis, Nour Alsabagh and AlJawhara Hassan H. Al-Thani.

This book would not have been possible without the work done by other historians of oil in Iran, many of whom have kindly helped me. I first learnt about the history of Abadan through reading the work of Kaveh Ehsani, and his influence on me continues to this day. He has encouraged me in my research even when I have been unsure about my own contributions. Rasmus Elling also played an important role in encouraging me to study the history of Abadan and gave me early opportunities to disseminate my research. Katayoun Shafiee was very generous in helping me work out how to approach the history of oil expertise. Greg Brew was such great company on our multiple visits to the same archives and conferences, also kindly sending sources and hosting me. Touraj Atabaki has always shared such precise knowledge about the social history of oil in Iran, and I have learnt much from Peyman Jafari and Ciruce Movahedi-Lankarani.

Along the way I have learnt so much from broader academic communities that I have been part of. Special thanks go to fellow members of the Oil Cultures in the Middle East and Latin America (OCMELA) group: Sanaz Sohrabi, Laura Hindelang, María Esperanza Rojo Jiménez, Mónica Salas Landa, Manuel Silva-Ferrer and Nelida Fuccaro. Our discussions and collaborations have helped me see oil in completely new ways and I could not have asked for a nicer group of people to work with. Mandana Limbert also read early drafts and gave me much food for thought. As I continue to research oil, there are many more people I cannot name here but owe thanks to in future. My early forays into the energy humanities were possible because of collaborating with Noura Wahby, Damilola Adebayo and Aditya Ramesh on a conference in 2019 at the University of Cambridge, and the generous support offered by CRASSH, Past & Present Society and the Society for the History of Technology. Firoozeh Kashani-Sabet and Robert Steele organised an online workshop at UPenn in 2021 on 'Iran and Global Decolonization', which encouraged me to situate Iranian oil nationalisation within a broader international framework, and Mazyar Ghiabi generously invited me to share findings from the book at the University of Exeter. Thanks also to Rowena Abdul Razak, Sebastian Rose and Olisa Godson Muojama for being so great to collaborate with, and especially to Rowena for creating the Iranian Studies Collective as a space for early career researchers to share their work.

The finishing touches to the book were made during a postdoctoral fellowship at the Leibniz-Zentrum Moderner Orient (ZMO) in Berlin, funded by the Alexander von Humboldt foundation. I would like to sincerely thank Katharina Lange, Stefan Kirmse and Ulrike Freitag for doing so much to support my application and agreeing to host me in the Environment and Justice unit. I have also had such stimulating conversations and many laughs with friends and colleagues from ZMO, including Ritam Sengupta, Vincent Favier, Rakiya El Matine, Nikolaos Olma, Sana Chavoshian, Nitin Sinha, Nitin Varma, Aksana Ismailbekova, Sagnik Kar, Minerwa Tahir, Jacob Neremberg, Nico Putz, Anandita Bajpai, Kai Kresse, Steven Serels, Hilal Alkan and Umut Kuruüzüm, as well as the wider academic community in Berlin, especially Deren Ertas, Sajjad Safaei and Priska Komaromi. Here I want to also express my immense gratitude to Christoph Rother for helping me settle in Berlin and being such a great friend over so many years.

As I write these acknowledgments, I am fortunate to now be working at the University of Bristol. I am grateful to Sumita Mukherjee, Leah Tether, James Thompson and Su Lin Lewis for guiding me through the first steps of the job. Thanks to all my other fabulous colleagues and friends here who make this such a positive environment, particularly Beth Rebisz, Catherine Phipps, Darius Wainwright, Lucy Wray, Manikarnika Dutta, Thomas Larkin and Zeina Maasri for helping me settle in initially. I am especially grateful to Darius and Lucy for their kindness and making me feel so at home. I am also lucky to be learning so much from the brilliance of my fellow environmental historians, Adrian Howkins, Andy Flack, Alice Would and Marianna Dudley. Thanks also to Simeon Koole, Nariman Massoumi, Negar Elodie Behzadi and Noreen Masud for kindly providing opportunities to present my work, and to Kate Skinner for supporting my research activities.

I want to thank all my other friends who have also been a part of the journey in some way. Thanks to Lottie Field and Sean Tull for always helping me to find meaning and put things into perspective, not to mention all the brunches and film nights! Thanks also to Joe Odell and Liam Rees, for the consistent comradeship through many political highs and lows and all the great chats about the state of the Left. Thanks to Amar Diwakar and Jonathan Kassian for opening me to a new world of music and providing a necessary escape through many sonic adventures. Thanks to Adrija Dey for always supporting me and providing so much comradely inspiration. Thanks to Brittany Kyser, Tom Smith, Jakub Zahora, Rowena Abdul Razak, Claire Nicolas, Leyla Sayfutdinova, Gabriel Young, Natasha Pesaran, Owain Lawson, Rana Baker, Ali Ugurlu, Guy Eyre, Faisal Hamadah, Hesam Forozan, Shima Shahbazi, Zep Kalb and Paniz Musawi Natanzi for the generosity, great company and wonderful memories during conferences and research trips. Thanks to Alina Werner, Brooke Rouah, Iskandar Ding and Asad Zaidi for keeping the magic of SOAS alive towards the end of my PhD and after. Thanks to old friends who I know I can always count on, no matter how much time has passed, especially Theo Dawson-Marsh, Kunal Gautami, Ellen Davis-Walker, Lois Bond, Di Zou and Vaughan Galdal-Gibbs.

Finally, I want to thank my family for their unconditional love and support. I am indebted to my extended family in Tehran for all their vital help on research visits, especially my aunt, Mahnaz Biglari. I thank my sister, Lily Biglari, for being the best sibling I could wish for in so many ways. Above all, I thank my parents, Janet Biglari and Behzad Biglari, who have done everything possible to support me. No words can convey the gratitude I have to them, but this book stands as testament to their unending love. I dedicate it to them.
