Acknowledgements

Much of the research for this project was first completed during graduate school and I would like to acknowledge the funding of University Graduate Fellowships at Arizona State University and the generous George and Collice Portnoff Endowed Fellowship in Comparative Literature. I am also grateful to my dissertation committee Robert E. Bjork, Heather Maring, and Robert Sturges and to Richard G. Newhauser and Rosalynn Voaden for their continued support and mentorship. They have all read various parts of this project in its different stages and have provided invaluable feedback. My graduate school colleagues also deserve thanks, both for their friendship during the often isolating experience of graduate school and for their willingness to read and comment on drafts and to discuss ideas.

The Arnamagnæan Institute in Copenhagen, the Stofnun Árna Magnússonar í íslenskum fræðum in Reykjavík, and the Kungliga biblioteket in Stockholm have all welcomed me into their libraries to examine manuscripts. I would like to thank Anne Mette Hansen, Matthew Driscoll, Suzanne Reitz, Svanhildur Óskarsdóttir, Ólöf Benediktsdóttir, and Patrik Granholm in particular for meeting with me, guiding me through their special collections, and assisting me with acquiring photographs of manuscripts.

Shannon Cunningham, acquisitions editor for the Northern Medieval World series, is due special gratitude. It was through her encouragement and guidance that I developed the project and submitted a proposal to Medieval Institute Publication's Northern Medieval World series. Her help and patience have been indispensable throughout this process. I'd like to also thank the editorial board of the Northern Medieval World series (Chair Carolyne Larrington, Oren Falk, Dawn Hadley, Kate Heslop, Jana Schulman, and Jón Viðar Sigurðsson) for their interest in the project, their feedback, and their promotion of new work in the field. I am grateful to be able to publish in a series that welcomes new approaches to Old Norse-Icelandic literature and culture and has published books by authors whose work I always look forward to reading. Christine Henschel, Michaela Göbels, Jonathan Hoare, Rebecca Straple, David Jüngst, Theresa M. Whitaker, and the editorial teams at De Gruyter and Medieval Institute Publications helped me throughout this process and I'm thankful for their assistance.

I am also indebted to Natalie M. Van Deusen, who reviewed this manuscript. Her expertise in Old Norse-Icelandic hagiography, on the manuscripts of saints' lives, and her insightful comments have significantly improved the book and helped me identify many missing connections. Any remaining errors or oversights are my own.

To my family, of course, I owe significant thanks and want to acknowledge my love and appreciation for them. To my dear wife Vivien—partner, friend, extoller, critic—thank you for bringing so much joy, adventure, and density into my life. Our little family delights, comforts, and encourages me. To our beloved son Theodore, thank you for your editorial assistance. I completed the revisions for this book in your first months of life, often with you sleeping on my chest. I'm looking forward to watching you grow up and to imparting to you a desire to be kind, to know, to be curious, and to investigate. To our four-legged housemates Olive and Oscar, you are both the greatest companions and a most welcome distraction from writing. It is difficult to estimate and express my indebtedness to my parents, Chris and Linda Najork. They made many sacrifices early in life (as did my grandparents) for the benefit of me and my brother. I will be forever grateful for their love, guidance, and encouragement.

Finally, I want to acknowledge my brother Jeff Najork, to whose memory this book is dedicated. Our closeness is hard to put into words. We not only grew up together but also lived together for five years as adults. I am deeply grateful to have been embraced by Jeff's generosity of spirit, his tenderness, friendship, and his loyalty for most of my life.

Jeff died on December 23, 2017, two weeks after Shannon and Medieval Institute Publications informed me that my book proposal had been accepted. Though most readers will likely not notice, the range of emotions I and my family experienced as we grieved his loss will always be painfully obvious to me in this book. Despite everything else it accomplishes, two interconnected threads in Maríu saga emerged as I read and reread the text. The saga is of course dedicated to interpreting scriptural mysteries and identifying proper devotion to the Virgin Mary, but it is also, in many ways, concerned with how to live a good life and how to prepare for and think about death. The saga confronts a number of questions that have been ever-present on my mind during the writing of this book: How should one live? What defines a good life? What does it mean to die (to cease to be)? What happens to us after death? To what extent is death to be celebrated and mourned? How should we commemorate the dead? How significant is the practice and place of burial? The last two chapters of the book, because they deal precisely with the ways in which the saga and the manuscripts preserving it deal with the complicated matter of death and what comes next, proved to be the most challenging and yet cathartic for me.
