This project has been many years in the making. I have therefore many years' worth of debts to acknowledge.

The National Endowment for the Humanities (NEH) granted me two fellowships at an early stage: the Council for Basic Education/NEH National Fellowship for Independent Study in the Humanities and the NEH Teacher-Scholar Fellowship, which allowed me the luxury of an entire sabbatical year reading, thinking through, and writing an early draft of what turned into this book. During my sabbatical year I was granted a Research Scholarship at the Dublin Institute for Advanced Studies which allowed me office space and access to perhaps the best library in the world for early Irish history; Trinity College, Dublin, accorded me the status of Visiting Academic. To both those institutions I owe a debt of thanks. I must also mention my previous institution, The Gilbert School, for graciously permitting me to take a sabbatical and for various other indulgences over many years.

I have delivered various parts of this book as papers in various venues over the years. I am grateful to the audiences for discussion of my work and for questions that have helped me to clarify my arguments. In particular, I acknowledge the Classical Society of Trinity College, Dublin; the TCD/UCD Classical Colloquium; the Harvard Celtic Colloquium; the Irish Conference of Medievalists; the International Congress of Medieval Studies, Kalamazoo; the Classical Association of New England; and the Classical Association of Connecticut. To all, my thanks.

This book is based on my doctoral dissertation, "Literary Culture in Early Christian Ireland: Hiberno-Latin Saints' Lives as a Source for Seventh-Century Irish History," at the University of Massachusetts Amherst. My greatest debt is to my dissertation director, Anna Taylor, per quam non licet esse neglegentem. Anna's constant encouragement and her probing reading of my drafts mean she has more than anyone to help me clarify my argument and especially my expression. I cannot thank her enough.

The members of my dissertation committee, Richard Lim, Jason Moralee, and Elizabeth Keitel, have all been generous with their time and interest. They have all commented helpfully on the various drafts of chapters. Dáibhí Ó Cróinín and Anthony Harvey graciously read and commented on several draft chapters. Maria Tymoczko and Stephen Harris were very helpful at an early stage of the dissertation process. Most recently, I owe a great debt to the two anonymous readers for Medieval Institute Publications/De Gruyter, and to the members of the Editorial Board for the Monastic Life and Venerated Spaces series, Jake Abel and Aneilya Barnes.

My most profound debt, as always, is to my wife, Dr. Ann Higgins. Most writers of books on medieval themes do not have the advantage of living in the same house as another medieval scholar. Her help is incalculable. Her influence is evident on every page. Le mo ghrá, go brách.
